The figures were announced for the first time by Wiley A. Branton, executive director of the Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council, following his appearance here before the annual convention of the Congress of Racial Equality.

Branton said the task had been accomplished by hundreds of field workers "despite apathy on the part of many Southern Negroes, intimidation from segregationists and a lack of full cooperation from the Federal government."

Only 1.5 million of the five million eligible Southern Negroes have been registered in the 11-state area of Louisiana, Mississippi, Florida, South Carolina, North Carolina, Georgia, Texas, Arkansas, Tennessee, Alabama and Virginia, he added.

"As more and more Negroes and thinking whites get to the polls, men like (Sen. Allen) Ellender (D-La.), (Mississippi Gov.) Barnett, (Alabama Gov.) Wallace and other racists will be driven from office," Branton predicted.

Although the project was originally established at the urging of the Justice Department, Branton was sharply critical of the Kennedy administration's cooperation with voter registration workers.

"Although they have filed hundreds of suits, they have not gone far enough," Branton said. "They must file more suits, follow them up vigorously and provide much-needed protection from violence and intimidation for our people and those who attempt to register.

NEGRO RIFT FLARES — in New York, Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. was jeered by a crowd of egg-tossing Negroes outside a Harlem church where he delivered a sermon on integration.

Rev. Dr. King, who heads the Southern Christian Leadership Conference and preaches non-violence in the Negro anti-segregation drive, was not struck by the eggs but several hit his car outside the Salem Methodist Church.

Police attributed the incident of the Black Muslim Negro supremacy organization. At a Harlem rally Saturday Muslim leader Malcolm X. urged his followers to "go up there (to Salem Church) tomorrow and let Uncle Tom (King) know that we are against him and do not believe what he preaches."

Inside the church, Rev. King told the congregation:

"I can't understand what my colored brothers have against me. I have become accustomed to white mobs in Mississippi and Alabama, but I have not yet adjusted myself to what I just experienced here in Harlem."

He then promised "to fight harder against the system which produced this violence."

RIGHTS BILL — In Washington, Sen. Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.) predicted that his Senate Commerce Committee will quickly approve the administration's controversial public accommodations section—but probably exempt "Mrs. Murphy's boarding house."

Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy goes before the opening hearing of Magnuson's committee today to argue the administration's case for the civil rights bill, which would give the Federal government authority to ban discrimination in most privately owned businesses open to the public.

A so-called "Mrs. Murphy" amendment has been suggested to exempt certain small businesses—like boarding houses—from the proposed anti-discrimination ban.

MARCH ON D.C.—The Congress of Racial Equality reaffirmed its support of a march on Washington if President Kennedy's civil rights legislation bogs down in a Senate filibuster.

N.A.A.C.P. CONCLAVE — National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People, oldest and largest of the Negro civil rights action groups in the United States, opens its 54th annual convention in Chicago today.

Among the highlights of the convention will be an emancipation centennial parade July 4 through Chicago's downtown streets with 50,000 white and Negro marchers.

Whites Fight Homeowner 'Panic'

PLAINFIELD, N.J. (AP)—Some 300 white and Negro homeowners have formed an association to prevent their integrated neighborhood from becoming a Negro ghetto.

The Hillside Terrace Neighborhood Assn. said the number of homes for sale in the area had caused a mild real estate panic.

David R. Nalvin, one of the group members who are white, said there was concern over the number of white families in the area who contemplate moving.

"It has been the experience in neighborhoods such as ours," he said, "that when houses go on the market, some real estate men show them only to Negroes on the assumption—which we believe to be incorrect—that white people would not desire to live in an integrated neighborhood.

"We hope to replace some of the white families who want to move, and will undoubtedly do so, with others who realize that people of different ethnic groups can live in harmony," he said.

The New York Times
D. 680,265 S. 1,306,418
JUL 1 1963

KENNEDY CHIDED ON RACIAL CRISIS

CORE Says White House Is Not Aware of Danger

By M. S. HANDLER

Special to The New York Times

DAYTON, Ohio, June 30 — Delegates to the annual convention of the Congress of Racial Equality charged here today that the Kennedy Administration was not aware of the potentialities for racial explosions in both North and South.

They urged Federal intervention in the South in the face of what they called "lawlessness" of the police, the local courts and "white hoodlums."

The convention, which ended today also urged President Kennedy to issue an Executive Order desegregating all public facilities.

The delegates rejected the Administration's suggestion that demonstrations be slowed and a march on Washington to coincide with debate on the Kennedy civil rights program be abandoned.

Wiley Branton, director of voter registration projects of the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta, told the convention that the illegal proceedings employed by the local courts in the South, including some Federal courts, had become so gross that it was useless for Negroes to seek trelief through the judicial process, as suggested by the President.

Negro 'Revolution'

Hence, Mr. Branton said, the Negro "revolution" must employ those means left open to it —nonviolent demonstrations.

The convention resolved to launch a nation-wide voter registration drive with emphasis on those Southern states that have erected the greatest obstacles to registration. Special task forces are to be sent to Baton Rouge, La., and to the Delta counties of Mississippi.

Delegates regarded the growing unemployment among Negroes as one of the keys to the problems. It was said that the rate of unemployment Negroes was two and one-half times as high as that in the white population. Speakers forecast a widening gap through automation.

A resolution that was referred to the congress's National Action Council referred to "the immediacy of the impending retaliation and mass violence on the part of the Negro community in our country, as evidenced by the fact that Negroes are increasingly arming themselves for the purpose of self-defense against continued oppression and violence," and charged:

"The Federal Government has evidenced no recognition of this situation."

Meeting to Plan March

Officers of the congress are scheduled to meet Tuesday in New York City with representatives of other civil rights organizations to set the date of the march and plan its details.

August 28 has been suggested as the tentative date, but the course of the expected Southern filibuster in the Senate will influence the choice of the date.

The convention also approved plans for demonstrations against slum housing in Brooklyn and on Newark, N. J.

A resolution pledging members to refuse to serve in the armed forces until discrimination had ceased was defeated on the floor.

According to convention reports, the organization has 61,000 contributors and 68 chapters totaling more than 4,000 active members who can be relied upon to organize mass demonstrations, picket lines, sit-ins, stand-ins and other forms of nonviolent action.

ATLANTA, GA.
CONSTITUTION
D. 202,635
JUL 1 1963

Vote Leader Stresses Negroes' Poll Power

By CLAUDE GEORGE SR.

Wiley Branton, director of the Voter Registration Project for the Southern Regional Council, said here recently that Southern politicians stand in fear of Negro voters and will give full recognition to the voting power that they have in any community.

Branton was a speaker at the Atlanta University Summer School Forum.

NEXT ELECTION

Politicians cannot see any farther than the next election, he told the summer school students, urging them to work for more registered voters in their own communities.

The end result of President John F. Kennedy's civil rights bill, now before Congress, he said, will be to encourage more Negroes to register and vote in their communities. There is little or no excuse for not becoming a registered voter, Branton said.

POWER TO CHANGE

Branton added that the coalition of the Southern white liberals and Negro voters can change the political thinking of politicians, including senators. School teachers, he said, can be "gap-fillers" in their communities by guiding the citizens on political issues.

There are 1,700 students enrolled for the summer school session at Atlanta University.

Booker Washington Has 1,700 for Term

Seventeen hundred students have enrolled at the Booker Washington High School for the summer session, the largest enrollment since the beginning of the summer school, Principal J. Y. Moreland announced.

Most of the students are taking advanced subjects, Moreland said, with only 15 per cent taking makeup subjects. The majority of the students are girls.

PATERSON, N.J.
CALL
D. 28,063

JUL 1 1963

115,000 Negroes Added To Southern Vote Lists

DAYTON, Ohio (UPI) — An 11-state drive conducted by the nation's major civil rights organizations added more than 115,000 Negroes to Southern voter registration lists in the first year of operation, the project's director said Sunday.

The figures were announced for the first time by Wiley A. Branton, executive director of the Voter Education Project (VEP) of the Southern Regional Council (SRC), following his appearance here before the annual convention of the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE).

Branton said the task had been accomplished by hundreds of field workers "despite apathy on the part of many Southern Negroes, intimidation from segregationists and a lack of full cooperation from the federal government."

Another 25,000 Negroes who would have been purged from registration lists retained their voting rights through the project's efforts, Branton said, while "uncounted thousands" of Negroes registered for the first time without the aid of project workers.

Only 1.5 million of the five million eligible Southern Negroes have been registered in the 11-state area of Louisiana, Mississippi, Florida, South Carolina, North Carolina, Georgia, Texas, Arkansas, Tennessee, Alabama and Virginia, he added.

"As more and more Negroes and thinking whites get to the polls, men like (U.S. Sen. Allen) Ellender, (D-La.,) (Mississippi Gov. Ross) Bah)png, (Alabama Gov. George) Wallace and other racists will be driven from office," Branton predicted.

"Politicians respond to the demands of voters. The more active Negroes become in politics, the more responsive office-holders will become to Negroes."

Branton's preliminary report covered the period from April 1, 1962, when the project was established, through March 31, 1963. Currently allocated funds will run out in October, 1964.

BRISTOL, VA.
HERALD COURIER
D. 21,285 S. 27,222

JUL 1 1963

115,000 Negroes Added To Southern Voting Lists

DAYTON, Ohio (UPI) —An 11-state drive conducted by the nation's major civil rights organizations added more than 115,000 Negroes to Southern voter registration lists in the first year of operation, the project's director said Sunday.

The figures were announced for the first time by Wiley A. Branton, executive director of the Voter Education Project (VEP) of the Southern Regional Council (SRC), following his appearance here before the annual convention of the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE).

Branton said the task had been accomplished by hundreds of field workers "despite apathy on the part of many Southern Negroes, intimidation from segregationists and a lack of full cooperation from the federal government."

Another 25,000 Negroes who would have been purged from registration lists retained their voting rights through the project's efforts, Branton said, while "uncounted thousands" of Negroes registered for the first time without the aid of project workers.

Only 1.5 million of the five million eligible Southern Negroes have been registered in the 11-state area of Louisiana, Mississippi, Florida, South Carolina, North Carolina, Georgia, Texas, Arkansas, Tennessee, Alabama and Virginia, he added.

"As more and more Negroes and thinking whites get to the polls, men like (U.S. Sen. Allen) Ellender, (D-La.,) (Mississippi Gov. Ross) Barnett, (Alabama Gov. George) Wallace and other racists will be driven from office," Branton predicted.

"Politicians respond to the demands of voters. The more active Negroes become in politics, the more responsive office-holders will become to Negroes."

BATON ROUGE, LA.
STATE TIMES
D. 34,571

JUL 1 1963

Say Rights Push Added 115,000 To Voting Lists

DAYTON, Ohio (UPI) — An 11-state drive conducted by the nation's major civil rights organizations added more than 115,000 Negroes to Southern voter registration lists in the first year of operation, the project's director said Sunday.

The figures were announced for the first time by Wiley A. Branton, executive director of the Voter Education Project (VEP) of the Southern Regional Council (SRC), following his appearance here before the annual convention of the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE).

Branton said the task had been accomplished by hundreds of field workers "despite apathy on the part of many Southern Negroes, intimidation from segregationists and a lack of full cooperation from the federal government."

Another 25,000 Negroes who would have been purged from registration lists retained their voting rights through the project's efforts, Branton said, while "uncounted thousands" of Negroes registered for the first time without the aid of project workers.

Only 1.5 million of the five million eligible Southern Negroes have been registered in the 11-state area of Louisiana, Mississippi, Florida, South Carolina, North Carolina, Georgia, Texas, Arkansas, Tennessee, Alabama nd Virginia, he added.

ROANOKE RAPIDS, N.C.
HERALD
D. 6,028 S. 6,039

JUL 2 1963

More Than 115,000 Negroes Added To Registration Lists

DAYTON, Ohio (UPI) — More than 115,000 Negroes were added to voter registration lists in 11 Southern states in the first year of the campaign by major civil rights organizations, the project's director reported here.

Wiley A. Branton, executive director of the voter education project of the Southern Regional Council, disclosed the figures for the first time at the annual convention of the Congress of Racial Equality.

The task was accomplished by hundreds of field workers, Branton said, "despite apathy on the part of many Southern Negroes, intimidation from segregationists and a lack of full cooperation from the federal government."

He said another 25,000 who would have been purged from the registration lists retained their voting rights through the project's efforts and other "uncounted thousands" of Negroes registered for the first time without the project workers' aid.

Branton said only 1.5 million of the five million eligible Negroes have been registered in the states of Louisiana, Mississippi, Florida, South Carolina, North Carolina, Georgia, Texas, Arkansas, Tennessee, Alabama, and Virginia.

He reported significant successes in Chattanooga, Nashville, Knoxville and Memphis, Tenn.; Little Rock, Ark.; Huntsville, Ala.; Miami, Orlando, St. Petersburg and Clearwater, Fla.; Atlanta, Macon, Augusta and Savannah, Ga.; Sumter and Charleston, S.C., and Rocky Mount, Edenton and Durham, N.C.

BATON ROUGE, LA.
ADVOCATE
D. 45,681 S. 66,530

JUL 1 1963

Say Rights Push Added 115,000 To Voting Lists

DAYTON, Ohio (UPI) — An 11-state drive conducted by the nation's major civil rights organizations added more than 115,000 Negroes to Southern voter registration lists in the first year of operation, the project's director said Sunday.

The figures were announced for the first time by Wiley A. Branton, executive director of the Voter Education Project (VEP) of the Southern Regional Council (SRC), following his appearance here before the annual convention of the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE).

Branton said the task had been accomplished by hundreds of field workers "despite apathy on the part of many Southern Negroes, intimidation from segregationists and a lack of full cooperation from the federal government."

Another 25,000 Negroes who would have been purged from registration lists retained their voting rights through the project's efforts, Branton said, while "uncounted thousands" of Negroes registered for the first time without the aid of project workers.

Only 1.5 million of the five million eligible Southern Negroes have been registered in the 11-state area of Louisiana, Mississippi, Florida, South Carolina, North Carolina, Georgia, Texas, Arkansas, Tennessee, Alabama nd Virginia, he added.

ATLANTA, GA.
JOURNAL
D. 259,003

JUL 2 1963

Legal Aid Fund On Integration Due

By FRED POWLEDGE

Seven leading civil rights organizations were expected to announce soon the establishment of a joint "emergency fund" to be used partly to pay the staggering legal bills which accumulate in the desegregation struggle.

If the fund does become a joint undertaking, it could have a unifying effect on the civil rights organizations, some of whom have been quarreling with each other in recent months.

INFORMED SOURCES said the announcement of the fund's establishment would come from these organizations:

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the NAACP Legal and Defense Educational Fund (a separate body from the NAACP itself), the Congress on Racial Equality, the Student Non-violent Coordinating Committee, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, the Urban League, and the National Council of Negro Churchwomen.

JUST WHERE the fund would come from was not known. There were some reports that one or more foundations might supply some of the money.

The fund would be used, sources said, to underwrite some of the cost of legal defense in desegregation crises.

The Southern Regional Council, a fact-finding body which supports integration, has estimated that 10,420 arrests have been made in the 11 Southern states since last April 3.

In the period between Feb. 1, 1960, and Sept. 1, 1960, the council had estimated the number of arrests at 3,600. This included not only the Southern states, but the border states as well.

SOURCES SAID the fund also would be used to support more "field staff" personnel for the civil rights organizations.

Some critics of the organizations have said recently that certain of the civil rights groups are top-heavy with office workers and short on persons to do the work in the field.

There has been some public fighting recently among some of the organizations about the cost of legal defense. Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the NAACP, was quoted not long ago as complaining that other groups specialize in getting Negroes into jail, then wait for the NAACP to get them out.

ATLANTA, GA.
WORLD
D. 29,800

JUL 3 1963

Voter Project Director Reports 115,000 Added

DAYTON, Ohio — (UPI)— An 11-state drive conducted by the nation's major civil rights organizations added more than 115,000 Negroes to Southern voter registration lists in the first year of operation, the project's director said Sunday.

The figures were announced for Washington. They will work as as executive director of the Voter Education Project VEP of the Southern Regional Council following his appearance here before the annual convention of the Congress of Racial Equality CORE.

Branton said the task had been accomplished by hundreds of field workers "despite apathy on the part of many Southern Negroes, intimidation from segregationists and a lack of full cooperation from the federal government."

Another 25,000 Negroes who would have been purged from registration lists retained their voting rights through the project's efforts, Branton said, while "uncounted thousands" of Negroes registered for the first time without the aid of project strikers.

Only 1.5 million of the five million eligible Southern Negroes have been registered in the 11 - state area of Louisiana, Mississippi, Florida, South Carolina, North Carolina, Georgia, Texas, Arkansas, Tennessee, Alabama and Virginia, he added.

"As more and more Negroes and thinking whites get to the polls, men like U. S. Sen. Allen Ellender, D-La., Mississippi Gov. Ross Barnett, Alabama Gov. George Wallace and other racists will be driven from office," Branton predicted.

"Politicians respond to the demands of voters. The more active Negroes become in politics, the more responsive office - holders will become to Negroes."

Branton's preliminary report covered the period from April, 1962, when the project was established, through March 31, 1963. Currently allocated funds will run out in October, 1964.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
LABOR PRESS
W. 125,168

JUL 3 1963

Civil Rights Statement Is Praised by PO Clerks

Milwaukee Post Office Clerks Local 3 has forwarded an excellent statement on civil rights which originally appeared in the June issue of its publication, Hi-Lites, and local officers have asked that it be reprinted so that all union members may have an opportunity to read it.

* * *

Robert Hutchins, widely known scholar, recently described the position of Negroes in America as follows: "The Negro in America is not a part of the American society. This is the greatest single crime that the American people have committed and one of the greatest crimes that any people have ever committed. The American Negro is discriminated against in every conceivable way. His housing is execrable. His compensation is lower for the same work done by white men. He is regarded as socially undesirable. This is a tremendous source of permanent disharmony in the United States."

Words Are Repeated

The Southern Regional Council states the same thing in these words: "Negroes are a disadvantaged tenth of Americans from cradle to grave. By American standards the typical Negro is born without adequate prenatal care, of uneducated parents, who dwell in an unstable neighborhood permeated and surrounded by cultural and economic poverty.

"He is reared amid deprivation and discrimination. His schools are inferior. He learns early the handicaps of his color and his incentives are fashioned to fit the bleak reality.

"He will endure all his life the ignominy of having to wheedle, bargain, negotiate or campaign for his elemental rights."

This situation exists because millions of white people are content to live with it. Though they may say they are not prejudiced, they must have subjective reasons for being actually prejudiced. The four common reasons are as follows: 1) the racist reason. These people start with the principle that Negroes are by nature inferior. Genuine science has totally disproved the theory that any race is by nature inferior to another.

And although most of these people are nominally Christian they cannot understand that God created all peoples equal and in his image and likeness. And so their Christian pronouncements become [illegible] for they make them so. 2) very matters is to inevitably push them farther into substandard and even subhuman ways of living.

Some Negroes, notably the Black Muslims, hold this separatist theory and they do a disservice to their people by holding this erroneous reason. 4) There are those who say that no matter what rights the colored have, the white people have a superior right to protect their homes, neighborhoods, business, public facilities, even their churches from damages that flow from the encroachment by Negroes.

Problems Arise

No one will deny that there are and will be specific problems constantly arising but this attitude simply brushes aside all the rights of Negroes and sweeps them under the rug. This is, perhaps the most common one in the north. And no matter how many disclaimers of prejudice or declarations of belief in rights, this still is a form of racism for it has to reduce Negroes to inferior human beings in every conceivable situation in which there is a conflict of rights.

This we have seen in our state in the open housing law which was not passed. All of these four attitudes are morally wrong.

And the only way to counteract them is to take positive action to promote racial justice. It is not enough to say "I am not prejudiced, but . . ." As union members who are supposed to be dedicated to the principle of brotherhood, we must make sure that in our own area we grant fully the right to be judged before we prejudge anyone. We must be fully aware that the interplay of various human rights requires the most careful study and the most delicate moral decisions. We cannot and should not hope to sweep it under the rug and think thereby that we shall be rid of it.

Get all the information you can from your interracial council on how and what you can do to bring about the day when equality will be a reality and people will be judged by their individual actions and not by group discrimination.

permeated and surrounded by cultural and economic poverty.

"He is reared amid deprivation and discrimination. His schools are inferior. He learns early the handicaps of his color and his incentives are fashioned to fit the bleak reality.

"He will endure all his life the ignominy of having to wheedle, bargain, negotiate or campaign for his elemental rights."

This situation exists because millions of white people are content to live with it. Though they may say they are not prejudiced, they must have subjective reasons for being actually prejudiced. The four common reasons are as follows: 1) the racist reason. These people start with the principle that Negroes are by nature inferior. Genuine science has totally disproved the theory that any race is by nature inferior to another.

And although most of these people are nominally Christian they cannot understand that God created all peoples equal and in his image and likeness. And so their Christian pronouncements become a lie for they make them so. 2) There are those who do not believe the racist reason but who say that the Negro himself is at fault for his inferior position.

Not Honest Statement

As soon as they abandon their criminal and shiftless ways, as soon as they become as cultured as we are, as soon as they prove they can be trusted, we will accept them — so they say. This holier than thou attitude is not honest. The majority of Negroes cannot rise very high in culture, education and virtue so long as they are discriminated against in employment, education, housing and recreation.

These discriminations must be first removed to fulfill the conditions laid down by the 'holier than thou' people. Actually, some Negroes against almost impossible odds have surpassed most white people in education, culture, virtue and citizenship. Are they then to be deprived of their rights until all Negroes lift themselves up by their bootstraps? 3) There are those who say in theory the Negro has all the rights of the white but should practice these rights in and among their own people.

In many areas of social life Negroes want to associate with their own people. But to make them completely dependent on themselves for schools, jobs, housing, recreation when they have been discriminated against in these beings in every conceivable situation in which there is a conflict of rights.

This we have seen in our state in the open housing law which was not passed. All of these four attitudes are morally wrong.

And the only way to counteract them is to take positive action to promote racial justice. It is not enough to say "I am not prejudiced, but . . ." As union members who are supposed to be dedicated to the principle of brotherhood, we must make sure that in our own area we grant fully the right to be judged before we prejudge anyone. We must be fully aware that the interplay of various human rights requires the most careful study and the most delicate moral decisions. We cannot and should not hope to sweep it under the rug and think thereby that we shall be rid of it.

Get all the information you can from your interracial council on how and what you can do to bring about the day when equality will be a reality and people will be judged by their individual actions and not by group discrimination.

ATLANTA, GA.
WORLD
D. 29,800

JUL 4 1963

Alpines Club Addressed By Dr. C. M. Smith

Dr. C. Miles Smith, president of the Atlanta Branch of the NAACP, was guest speaker at civic meeting of the Alphines Club, Sunday at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Andrews.

Dr. Smith explained the organization of the local branch of the NAACP and the civil rights proposals pending before Congress and the role of his organization in the current freedom crusade in the South.

Marion Johnson, president of the club, introduced the speaker, who was aompained by Vernon Jordan of the Southern Regional Council. Mr. Johnson was formerly a field secretary of the NAACP.

Several club representatives were present for the give and take session which was highlighted by the Alpines Club presenting $50 toward a life membership the club pledged to underwrite.

Among the club representatives were Mrs. Bertha Cauthern and Mrs. Grace Sterling, Les Poinsettas; Mrs. Emma Showers and Ruth Thompson, La Dames and W. J. Ruth, Bronzemen.

Guests present include L. M. Ross, Leon P. Jones and M. E. Jackson.

Other members of the Alpines Club are Nathaniel Rogers, vice president; Malon D. Ware, corresponding secretary and financial secretary; Mr. Andrews, business manager; Robert Pooler, treasurer; Johnnie C. Carmichael, chaplain, Lewis Grizzle, reporter and Horace Price, member.

NORFOLK, VA.
JOURNAL AND GUIDE
SAT. 30,579
JUL 6 1963

On The Civil Rights Front . . .

First Demonstrations In Martin County, N. C.

Special Correspondence

WILLIAMSTON, N. C. — Martin County, N. C., was untouched by segregation protest demonstrations until Sunday when some 250 colored residents turned up at the City Hall here for a "prayer meeting for the end of segregation"

Indication was given that other demonstrations are in the offing unless racial barriers in the area are lifted. Golden Frinks, field secretary of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference headed by the Rev. M. L. King Jr., is cooperating with area citizens in planning their protests.

In other racial developments:

- The Good Neighbor Council named by N. C. Gov. Terry Sanford in January, was to hold its first formal meeting in Raleigh Wednesday to seek means of providing training for Negroes seeking equal employment opportunities.
- At Dunn, N. C., Mayor George Blalock is to name a committee of four whites and two Negroes this week to work out racial problems. The president of the Dunn branch of the NAACP reported Sunday he and other Negro leaders were pleased with progress made by Blalock and no picketing was planned.
- At Greensboro, N. C., the Guilford County Board of Education agreed Saturday to transfer six Negro students to previously all-white schools in the first integration move in the county system. Greensboro schools have been integrated for some time.
- At Greensboro, tough talking Teamsters President Jimmy Hoffa told a Greensboro news conference Saturday there was no need for severe new laws outlawing job discrimination because racial bias would break the back of the American labor movement.
- At Dayton, Ohio, Wiley A. Branton, executive director of the Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council, said Sunday his group had made major strides in registering Negro voters in Rocky Mount, Edenton and Durham, N. C.
- At Kansas City, Kan., between 700 and 800 Negroes marched Sunday in downtown Kansas City in memory of slain civil rights leader Medgar Evers of Mississippi.
- At Philadelphia, four hundred Negro ministers said Sunday they had called off their "selective patronage" campaign against a chain store because the firm had yielded to their integration demands.
- At Stamford, Conn., an hour-long demonstration protesting alleged inequities in employment and housing opportunities for minorities was held Sunday by more than 600 Negroes.
- At Cambridge, Md., the city commission instructed its attorney Sunday night to prepare an amendment to the city charter providing equal public accommodations in the racially troubled Eastern Shore city guarded by National Guardsmen.

NORFOLK, VA.
JOURNAL AND GUIDE
SAT. 30,579

JUL 6 1963

Purge Of 25,000 Halted

More Than 115,000 Added To 11 States' Vote Rolls

DAYTON, Ohio — (UPI) — More than 115,000 Negroes were added to voter registration lists in 11 Southern states in the first year of the campaign by major civil rights organizations, the project's director reported Sunday.

Wiley A. Branton, executive director of the voter education project of the Southern Regional Council, disclosed the figures for the first time at the annual convention of the Congress of Racial Equality.

THE TASK was accomplished by hundred of field workers, Mr. Branton said, "despite apathy on the part of many Southern Negroes, intimidation from segregationists and a lack of full cooperation from the federal government."

He said another 25,000 who would have been purged from the registration lists retained their voting rights through the project's efforts and other "uncounted thousands" of Negroes registered for the first time without the project workers' aid.

MR. BRANTON said only 1.5 million of the five million eligible Negroes have been registered in the states of Louisiana, Mississippi, Florida, South Carolina, North Carolina, Georgia, Texas, Arkansas, Tennessee, Alabama, and Virginia.

He reported significant successes in Chattanooga Nashville, Knoxville and Memphis, Tenn.; Little Rock, Ark.; Huntsville, Ala.; Miami, Orlando, St. Petersburg and Clearwater, Fla.; Atlanta, Macon, Augusta and Savannah, Ga.; Sumter and Charleston, S. C., and Rocky Mount, Edenton and Durham, N. C.

LOUISVILLE, KY.
COURIER JOURNAL
D. 220,140 S. 324,549

JUL 7 1963

Cities To Get Relations Council Aid

Kentucky communities will be offered help in setting up local councils on human relations, the Kentucky Council on Human Relations decided at a meeting yesterday at Plymouth Settlement House.

A committee headed by the Rev. J. T. Davis will confer with the State Commission on Human Rights and offer cooperation in finding leadership and establishing communications to promote good race relations throughout the state.

Dr. Hugh A. Brimm, compliance supervisor for the U. S. Army Materiel Command's Office of Equal Employment Opportunity, Birmingham, Ala., told the group some of his experiences in dealing with manufacturers holding Government contracts in the Southeastern area.

Only one instance of reluctance was apparent on the part of a manufacturer and he was brought promptly into line by threat of loss of his contract, Brimm said.

The Kentucky Council on Human Relations, of which Mrs. Harry S. McAlpin is chairman, is an affiliate of the Southern Regional Council.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST-DISPATCH
D. 347,672 S. 564,337

JUL 7 1963

Negro March On Capital May Backfire

Demonstration Could Be 'Disastrous,' Expert on Racial Equality Warns

By RAYMOND P. BRANDT
Contributing Editor of the Post-Dispatch

WASHINGTON, July 6

THE DECISIONS of Negro leaders to hold a massive "convention" in Washington early next month and a "march on Washington" three weeks later raise two far-reaching questions. They are:

1. Will the assembling in the national capital of large numbers of Negroes and their white sympathizers hasten or delay legislative action on President John F. Kennedy's comprehensive civil rights program?

2. Whatever the immediate effect on Congress, how will the huge gatherings affect the presidential and congressional elections next year?

Advocates of the President's recommendations both in the executive and legislative branches are against the two meetings, but are not publicly opposing them. Some may take part in the demonstrations. Moderates in Congress, who intended to vote for most of the program, are definitely against the influx into Washington of marchers whose numbers may exceed 100,000.

For the people of Washington and others who fear that the large crowds may get out of control, Mrs. Agnes E. Meyer, with an outstanding record for accomplishments in the racial equality field, has become an informed spokesman. Writing this week in the New York Times, Mrs. Meyer, whose family owns the Washington Post and Newsweek magazine, said:

"Of all the plans for demonstrations now contemplated, none would be more disastrous than the march of thousands of Negroes upon Washington in August to urge the passage of the Administration's civil rights bill. Democratic government itself is imperiled when any group seeks to intimidate members of Congress.

"Accommodations for the invaders in the District of Columbia would be inadequate. Tempers would flare in the heat of a Washington summer. It can readily be foreseen that catastrophic outbreaks of violence, bloodshed and property damage would inevitably take place. And for what purpose? It could only set back the just claims of the Negro for economic, education and social progress."

Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy, who testified on three days this week before a Senate committee on the public accommofighting a miserable rear guard action. We are now engaged in mopping up operations."

Brandt

FROM PAGE ONE

The Dayton and Chicago conventions revealed the organized Negroes's dissatisfaction with the President's program as inadequate. The principal complaints of the NAACP were that the White House recommendations did not provide for a federal Employment Practices Commission with subpoena powers; that they did not give the Attorney General enough authority to initiate suits to protect all civil rights, and that they did not provide sanctions against labor unions that discriminate against Negroes.

After Wilkins had bitterly criticized Senate Minority Leader Everett M. Dirksen of Illinois and Republican Senator Barry Goldwater of Arizona, whose names were booed by the delegates, the convention adopted a resolution to support the President's program plus the desired expansion of authority. It included a section implying retaliation at the polls next year against Senators who vote against the imposition of cloture which said:

"We shall construe the failure of any Senator to support such action (limitation of debate) as a vote against civil rights."

THE DAYTON MEETING of the CORE delegates was more concerned about local discriminations than national issues. Nevertheless, Wiley A. Branton, executive director of the voters' educational project of the Southern Regional Council, reported that 115,000 additional Negro voters had been registered in 11 southern states, where only 1,500,000 of the 5,000,000 eligible Negroes are registered.

"As more and more Negroes and thinking whites get to the polls," he said, "men like (Senator Allen J.) Ellender (Dem.), Louisiana, (Gov. Ross R.) Barnett (Dem.), Mississippi and Gov. George C. Wallace (Dem.), Alabama, and other racists will be driven from office."

There were unsubstantiated reports that CORE and other organizations that have supported the Freedom Riders, sit-inners and school desegregation demonstrators would attempt similar tactics at the Capitol when the civil rights bill is being debated, particularly if the southern Senators carry out their threats of a prolonged filibuster.

Several Senators and Representatives, speaking for a larger number of their colleagues, flared up at these reports and

In his civil rights message to Congress, Mr. Kennedy foresaw that disorderly demonstrations could endanger his recommendations. Cautioning against continued violence, he said.

"This problem is now before the Congress. Unruly tactics or pressures will not help and may hinder the effective consideration of these measures. If they are enacted, there will be legal remedies available; and, therefore, while the Congress is completing its work, I urge all community leaders, Negro and white, to do their utmost to lessen tensions and to exercise self-restraint. The Congress should have an opportunity to freely work its will. Meanwhile, I strongly support action by local public officials and merchants to remedy these grievances on their own."

disastrous than the march of thousands of Negroes upon Washington in August to urge the passage of the Administration's civil rights bill. Democratic government itself is imperiled when any group seeks to intimidate members of Congress.

"Accommodations for the invaders in the District of Columbia would be inadequate. Tempers would flare in the heat of a Washington summer. It can readily be foreseen that catastrophic outbreaks of violence, bloodshed and property damage would inevitably take place. And for what purpose? It could only set back the just claims of the Negro for economic, education and social progress."

Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy, who testified on three days this week before a Senate committee on the public accommodations section of the civil rights bill, warned that the Washington march could "backfire" on the President's program. Speaking in McLean, Va., he observed that "it is a basic American right to petition," but predicted "an adverse effect" if Congressmen feel they are being pressured or intimidated.

He did not oppose the Washington gatherings or suggest they be canceled, but said:

"It comes down to how they are going to handle themselves. A good deal of judgment will be required of the leaders to prevent it (the march) from backfiring."

The deputy chief of police for Washington announced that he would hold meetings next week with the Negro leaders about handling the marchers.

THE DECISIONS for large, peaceful demonstrations in Washington were made in three cities. In Dayton, O., the twenty-first annual convention of the Congress of Racial Equality passed a resolution favoring a mammoth march into Washington. At Chicago, the fifty-fourth annual convention of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People unanimously resolved for a civil rights convention to be held in the national capital Aug. 6 to 8.

In New York, leaders of seven major civil rights organizations decided Tuesday to co-ordinate their campaigns to expand the President's program and to support a mass demonstration in Washington on Aug. 28. They said also that they would work together to try to raise $1,500,000 for a joint emergency fund to employ additional field staffs and more lawyers to handle the increasing number of court cases resulting from mass arrests. They said $800,000 had been collected or pledged.

The leaders who met in New York included the most respected Negroes in the civil rights movement. The principal spokesmen were Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of NAACP, and the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. Both emphasized that the march to end in Washington would not be marred by "civil disobedience" or sit-ins in the Capitol corridors or chambers.

The other organizations represented at the summit unity meeting were the National Urban League, whose executive director is Whitney M. Young Jr.; CORE, headed by James Farmer; the National Council of Negro Women, whose president is Mrs. Dorothy Height; the NAACP legal defense and educational fund, Jack Greenberg, general counsel, and the Student Non-Violent Co-ordinating Committee, whose executive director is James Foreman.

AN OBJECTIVE of the unity meeting was to curb the rivalry between the various organizations and their leaders. The NAACP is the oldest and best financed group, with 1600 chapters throughout the country. Wilkins recently complained that "other groups make the noise while NAACP pays the bills." He was referring to the money his organization had paid for lawyers and fines and put up for bonds.

Wilkins told the Chicago meeting:

"It is our contention that the backbone of segregation has been broken. Philosophically, we have won. Our opponents are

TURN TO PAGE 8, COLUMN 3

THE DAYTON MEETING of the CORE delegates was more concerned about local discriminations than national issues. Nevertheless, Wiley A. Branton, executive director of the voters' educational project of the Southern Regional Council, reported that 115,000 additional Negro voters had been registered in 11 southern states, where only 1,500,000 of the 5,000,000 eligible Negroes are registered.

"As more and more Negroes and thinking whites get to the polls," he said, "men like (Senator Allen J.) Ellender (Dem.), Louisiana, (Gov. Ross R.) Barnett (Dem.), Mississippi and Gov. George C. Wallace (Dem.), Alabama, and other racists will be driven from office."

There were unsubstantiated reports that CORE and other organizations that have supported the Freedom Riders, sit-inners and school desegregation demonstrators would attempt similar tactics at the Capitol when the civil rights bill is being debated, particularly if the southern Senators carry out their threats of a prolonged filibuster.

Several Senators and Representatives, speaking for a larger number of their colleagues, flared up at these reports and predicted that the President's whole program might be defeated if the Negroes and their sympathizers became unruly or openly threatened reprisals against individual legislators who did not vote down the line for all the President's recommendations.

The New York summit meeting took note of this resentment by deciding against a demonstration at the Capitol. Instead, there will be a parade through downtown Washington culminating in a two-hour rally at the Lincoln Memorial. The leaders obtained the promise that Catholic, Protestant and Jewish social welfare organizations would participate in the gathering. Civil disobedience, such as occurred in Baltimore on July 4, was ruled out.

Whether the managers will be able to curb the more militant groups, colored and white, is a question that perplexes the Administration and the Washington police. Disorders, like that in Chicago, where Mayor Richard J. Daley was prevented from speaking by unruly groups and a Negro church leader's life was threatened, would have congressional repercussions adverse to the President's recommendations.

THE WIDESPREAD, militant demonstrations in northern and border states already have brought letters of condemnation to Senators and Representatives from white voters in suburban and small towns who fear that the Administration plans legislative and executive measures that would affect private housing.

These communications come from constituencies where the Negroes are a small but growing minority and do not yet have the balance of power on election day as they do in the larger industrial cities. A Representative from a medium-size city in a border state said that 90 per cent of his mail on civil rights was against the Kennedy recommendations.

Democratic Congressmen in this category are weighing whether a vote for the President's program will bring primary and election opposition from the white majority. Republicans, in the same class, are beginning to prefer Senator Goldwater over Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller of New York for their presidential nomination.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
OBSERVER
W. CIRC.N.AVAIL.
JUL 12 1963

Liberals Urged To "Bridge Gulfs"

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — The nation's liberals, colored and white, were urged to "bridge gulfs and tear down walls" on the civil rights front by a Southern Regional Council official. last week.

Attorney Marion A. Wright, vice president of SRC, rallied liberals to participate in the "birth of a genuine partnership between white and Negro" which began with the sit-in efforts of four Negro college students at Greensboro, North Carolina in February of 1960 to the end, or near end, of segregation and racial discrimination. "We have moved towards the millenium of the South when those who could, took up the cudgel for those who couldn't eat at lunch counters," he said. "We now have a lasting, common fraternity between the races and we must never again go our respective ways."

development of strong civil liberties to implement civil rights gains; 2. and establishment of a world government to redress racial wrongs. "Clouds of fear still hang over the heads of many southerners, causing men to whisper their views rather than shout them from housetops," he said, adding: "civil rights will never be secured until civil liberties are secured."

Mr. Wright warned that, while segregation is on the way out, "southern political minds haven't changed an iota since the days of John C. Calhoun." He also warned against those who "would drive lines separating us" among forces already at work to negate gains. The SRC executive charged that history shows northern states ended discrimination only to re-establish it in more efective, subtle forms.

HOUSTON, TEXAS
INFORMER
W. 11,193
JUL 13 1963

Negroes to Vote

DAYTON, OHIO (ANP)—One hundred and fifteen thousand more Negroes in 11 southern states will be ready to cast votes for the next President of the United States as the result of a year long vote drive, it was reported here last week.

The figures were announced by Wiley A. Branton, executive director of the Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council after his appearance here before the annual convention of the Congress of Racial Equality.

Branton, a lawyer at Pine Bluff, Ark., until he accepted the voting drive assignment of Atlanta, is the attorney for the plaintiffs in the Little Rock School desegregation case. He reported that the drive had scored a "significant success" at Little Rock.

Branton said the task had been accomplished by hundreds of field workers "despite apathy on the part of many Southern Negroes, intimidation from segregationists and a lack of full cooperation from the federal government."

Another 25,000 Negroes who would have been purged from registration lists retained their voting rights through the Project's efforts, Branton said, while "uncounted thousands" of Negroes registered for the first time without the aid of Project workers.

Only 1,500 of the 5,000 eligible Negroes in Louisiana, Mississippi, Florida, South Carolina, Georgia, Texas, Arkansas, Tennessee, Alabama and Virginia are registered, he added.

"As more and more Negroes and thinking whites get to the polls, men like (Senator Allen) Ellender, (Dem., La.) (Mississippi Governor Ross) Barnett, (Alabama Governor George) Wallace and other racists will be driven from office," Branton predicted.

"Politicians respond to the demands of voters. The more active the Negroes become in politics, the more responsive office-holders will become to Negroes.

Branton's preliminary report covered the period from April 1, 1962, when the Project was established, to March 31, 1963. The projects funds will run out in October, 1964.

Six Project staff members working out of an Atlanta office coordinate field work being done by CORE, the Student Non-Violent Co-ordinating Committee, the National Urban League and the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

Although the Project originally was established at the urging of the Justice Department, which reportedly believes that Negro voting power will lead to desegregation in other fields, Branton was sharply critical of the Kennedy administration's co-op nedy administration's cooperation with voter registration workers.

"Although they have filed hundreds of suits, they have not gone far enough," Branton said. "They must file more suits, follow them up vigorously and provide much needed protection from violence and intimidation for our people and those who attempt to register.

"Why is it that when a bank is robbed in Mississippi, the Federal Bureau of Investigation has men on the scene in two hours, but when our people are illegally jailed and beaten it takes them two days or longer?" he asked.

SHREVEPORT, LA.
SUN
W. 9,600
PAGE
CERTIFIE
JUL 13 1963

Says 115,000 More Negroes Ready To Vote In South

Dayton, Ohio (ANP) — One hundred and fifteen thousand more Negroes in 11 southern states will be ready to cast votes for the next President of the United States as the result of a year long vote drive, it was reported here last week.

The figures were announced by Wiley A. Branton, executive director of the Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council after his appearance here before the annual convention of the Congress of Racial Equality.

Branton, a lawyer at Pine Bluff, Ark., until he accepted the voting drive assignment of Atlanta, is the attorney for the plaintiffs in the Little Rock School desegregaion case. He reported that the drive had scored a "significant success" at Little Rock.

Branton said the task had been accomplished by hundreds of field workers "despite apathy on the part of many Southern Negroes, intimidation from segregationists and a lack of full co-operation from the federal government."

Another 25,000 Negroes who would have been purged from registration lists retained their voting rights through the Project's efforts, Branton said, while "uncounted thousands" of Negroes registered for the first time without the aid of Project workers.

Only 1,500,000 of the 5,000,000 eligible Negroes in Louisiana, Mississippi, Florida, South Carolina, North Carolina, Georgia, Texas, Arkansas, Tennessee, Alabama and Virginia are registered, he added.

"As more and more Negroes and thinking whites get to the polls, men like (Senator Allen) Ellender, (D., La.), (Mississippi Governor Ross) Barnett, (Alabama Governor George) Wallace and other racists will be driven from office," Branton predicted.

(See—VOTE, page 8)

Vote

(Continued from page 1)

"Politicians respond to the demands of voters. The more active the Negroes become in politics, the more responsive office-holders will become to Negroes.

Branton's preliminary report covered the period from April 1, 1962, when the Project was established, to March 31, 1963. The project funds will run out in October, 1964.

The New York Times
D. 680,265 S. 1,306,418
JUL 14 1963

11 States Accused of Bad Faith For 'Token' School Integration

Sociologist Reports That Less Than 1% of All Negroes Attend Classes With Whites—Nominal Laws Assailed

Bad faith in the operation of integration plans in 11 Southern states, it has been asserted, has maintained racial segregation in public schools intact nine years after the Supreme Court outlawed it.

This is the conclusion of a new report, "Token Desegregation and Beyond," issued yesterday by the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta and the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith in New York.

However, the report said, recent Federal district court and High Court rulings now offer hope of bringing to an end the evasive tactics of the "resistant" states and to force the Deep South to speedier compliance.

The author of the report is J. Kenneth Morland, professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College, Lynchburg, Va.

Professor Morland reported that only four-tenths of the 1 per cent of all Negroes in the 11 "most recalcitrant" states were attending schools with white children by the end of the current term. The states involved, he said, are Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

92 of 100 Segregated

Even when adding the record of "compliant" states — Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia — and the District of Columbia, he said, nearly 92 of every 100 Negroes in the Southern and border states attended segregated classes.

In the 11 resistant states only 11.8 percent of the so-called biracial school districts had been even nominally desegregated, Professor Morland said. This "inadequate" performance, he continued, was even more apparent than real.

By contrast, 90.6 percent of the biracial districts in the the border states integrated their schools in November, 1962. Delaware, Maryland, West Virginia and the District of Columbia desegregated all their school districts.

Professor Morland described as "token integration" those measures that are designed to offer nominal and technical compliance with the Supreme Court ruling but actually maintain complete or almost complete segregation.

"Token integration operates on the basis of fear and subterfuge—fear of integration itself and subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive," he said.

"While difficult problems can arise as communities change a biracial school ssytem into a nonracial one," he continued, "compliant states have demonstrated that this change can be made creatively and successfully."

Recent rulings by United States circuit courts and the Supreme Court, Professor Morland noted, have begun to recognize these token measures as evasions of the law.

Among these are pupil-placement plans and restrictive transfer provisions. The former, he said, gives to school boards the right to assign pupils individually to specific schools, with no specific mention made of race among the criteria for selection.

In practice, the boards assign Negroes and whites alike to schools in which all or nearly all attendance is of the same race, he declared.

Transfers Limited to Race

Such laws, Professor Morland said, have provisions for appeal from such assignments, but these are so complex and costly to pursue that few petitioners have the energy or resources to carry litigation to a successful conclusion.

Restrictive transfer provisions, he reported, have been widely used to lessen or nullify the effect of the so-called "grade-a-year" desegregation plans adopted in some school districts.

Under theses plans, one grade is desegregated each year and children of both races are assigned to schools nearest their homes. However, by administrative decision, the professor said, white children assigned to predominantly Negro schools and Negroes attending schools with a white majority are freely granted transfers to schools of their own race. The transfer of Negroes to white schools or, in rare cases, that of whites to Negro schools are not permitted, he said.

He cited other evasions that have given local communities the option of closing down public schools ordered to desegregate. Tuition grants by states to permit pupils to attend segregated private schools were also noted.

When the report was written the Supreme Court had not yet ruled on the constitutionality of the pupil-placement provisions. It has ruled unanimously that two representative pupil transfer plans are unconstitutional.

"Ostensibly, the plans for keeping integration at token levels have been devised to try to satisfy the courts," Professor Morland said. "It is quite obvious now that they are not doing so, and that the courts are becoming less and less patient with the bad faith implicit in them."

It is essential that the attack on such evasions be pressed, he went on, by "the determination of Negro plaintiffs, the vigor of the Federal Government and the willingness of school boards and communities to act in good faith."

The professor also attacked what he termed the racial and social fallacies on which resistance to segregation is based. These include, he said, the idea, universally rejected by scientists, that capacity to learn has any direct connection with race and that school integration will result in lower educational standards and heightened social tensions.

He dismissed the argument of racial inequality, saying:

"Americans can be treated as individuals rather than as members of races and they can be given equal opportunity as individuals to develop their abilities without fear of any consequences known to science."

He said those in the forefront of the integration movement—notably in Louisville and Baltimore—have declared that desegregation of schools has improved educational standards and has coincided with, if not actually caused, a decline in juvenile delinquency.

MEMPHIS, TENN.
WORLD
TW. 7,400
JUL 13 1963

Liberals Urged To "Bridge Gulfs"

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — The nation's liberals, colored and white, were urged to "bridge gulfs and tear down walls" on the civil rights front by a Southern Regional Council official, last week.

Attorney Marion A. Wright, vice president of SRC, rallied liberals to participate in the "birth of a genuine partnership between white and Negro" which began with the sit-in efforts of four Negro college students at Greensboro, North Carolina in February of 1960 to the end, or near end, of segregation and racial discrimination. "We have moved towards the millenium of the South when those who could, took up the cudgel for those who couldn't eat at lunch counters," he said. "We now have a lasting, common fraternity between the races and we must never again go our respective ways."

Attorney Wright sees problems yet to be resolved. Among them: 1. development of strong civil liberties to implement civil rights gains; 2. and establishment of a world government to redress racial wrongs. "Clouds of fear still hang over the heads of many southerners, causing men to whisper their views rather than shout them from housetops," he said, adding: "civil rights will never be secured until civil liberties are secured."

Mr. Wright warned that, while segregation is on the way out, "southern political minds haven't changed an iota since the days of John C. Calhoun." He also warned against those who "would drive lines separating us" among forces already at work to negate gains. The SRC executive charged that history shows northern states ended discrimination only to re-establish it in more efective, subtle forms.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES-PICAYUNE
D. 193,514 S. 302,677

JUL 14 1963

Study Reveals Mixing Slowed

'Token Integration and Beyond' Published

By HOYT HARWELL

ATLANTA, Ga. (AP) — Fewer than one in 100 Negro pupils in 11 Southern states are attending desegregated schools, a study showed today.

The study, "Token Integration and Beyond," was published by the Anti-Defamation league of B'nai B'rth and the Southern Regional Council, a nonprofit, nonpolitical, biracial research and educational organization.

A professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College in Lynchburg, Va., J. Kenneth Morland, summarized the findings.

He said continued segregation was a result of "fear of integration itself" and "subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive" of 1954 which ruled public school segregation unconstitutional.

NO MIX IN SOME AREAS

The study, based on compilations in November 1962, showed that Alabama, Mississippi and South Carolina had no integration at all in public primary and secondary schools.

Moreland's findings dealt with Southern and border states school districts. They showed that 31.8 per cent of biracial districts have been desegregated in the area.

An over-all percentage of 90.6 was listed for Delaware, District of Columbia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia.

In the 11 other states, which Morland labeled "resistant" toward desegregation, 11.8 per cent of the districts have been desegregated.

States in which all school districts have been desegregated were listed as Delaware, Maryland and West Virginia, plus the District of Columbia.

In the "resistant" states, .4 per cent of the Negro pupils were in desegregated schools. In the other "compliant" states, Morland said, the percentage was 51.1.

He said that state legislatures have passed at least 379 laws since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling.

"A basic method for keeping desegregation in public schools at token levels has been through the adoption of pupil placement laws," he said.

In actual operation, Morland contended, these laws "have been used with the assumption that initial assignments could be by race. Negroes have been assigned to all-Negro schools and whites to all-white schools, even though ostensibly on criteria other than race."

'LOCAL OPTION' METHOD

The professor added:

"In practice, the children who have applied for transfers from schools to which members of their race have been assigned have almost always been Negroes. Thus actual integration of schools has depended upon whether Negro parents and their children were willing to go through time-consuming, expensive steps to contest the initial assignment."

A second anti-integration method, he said, has been "local option" provisions which allow communities to close schools ordered to desegregate.

"Another device for avoiding integrated schools has been the offer of tuition grants to allow pupils to attend private, nonsectarian schools instead of public schools," Morland said. "Six states — Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, North Carolina and Virginia — have passed such legislation."

'GRADE-A-YEAR PLAN'

He said:

"Still another way of keeping integration at low levels has been the grade-a-year or stair-step plan."

Morland said that if communities "continue to try to maintain de facto racial segregation in their public schools, they can be assured of two things. It will be futile in the long run, and it will be costly."

He said the federal courts have become "less and less patient" with token integration plans and have "blunted and eliminated" many such plans.

"Federal courts," he concluded, "are not going to permit the continuation of racial schools, and states may well be faced with either closing all of their public schools or extending integration beyond token levels."

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M.
JOURNAL
D. 48,784 S. 70,885

JUL 14 1963

Integration of Schools Resisted in 11 States

ATLANTA (AP) — Fewer than one in 100 Negro pupils in 11 southern states are attending desegregated schools, a study shows.

The study, "Token Integration and Beyond," was published by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith and the Southern Regional Council, a non-profit, non-political, biracial research and educational organization.

A professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College in Lynchburg, Va., J. Kenneth Morland, summarized the findings.

He said continued segregation was a result of "fear of integration itself" and "subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive" of 1954 which ruled public school segregation unconstitutional.

No Integration

The study, based on complications in November 1962, showed that Alabama, Mississippi and South Carolina had no integration at all in public primary and secondary schools.

Morland's findings dealt with southern and border state school districts. They showed that 31.8 per cent of biracial districts have been desegrated in the area.

An over-all percentage of 90.6 was listed for Delaware, District of Columbia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia.

In the 11 other states, which Morland labeled "resistant" toward desegregation, 11.8 per cent of the districts have been desegregated.

States in which all school districts have been desegregated were listed as Delaware, Maryland and West Virginia, plus the District of Columbia.

379 Laws Passed

In the "resistant" states, 4 per cent of the Negro pupils were in desegregated schools. In the other "compliant" states, Morland said, the percentage was 51.1.

He said that state legislatures have passed at least 379 laws since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling.

"A basic method for keeping desegregation in public schools at token levels has been through the adoption of pupil placement laws," he said.

In actual operation, Morland contended, these laws "have been used with the assumption that initial assignments could be by race. Negroes have been assigned to all-Negro schools and whites to all-white schools, even though ostensibly on criteria other than race."

Steps Expensive

The professor added:

"In practice, the children who have applied for transfers from schools to which members of their race have been assigned have almost always been Negroes. Thus actual integration of schools has depended upon whether Negro parents and their children were willing to go through time-consuming, expensive steps to contest the initial assignment."

A second anti-integration method, he said, has been "local option" provisions which allow communities to close schools ordered to desegregate.

"Another device for avoiding integrated schools has been the offer of tuition grants to allow pupils to attend private, nonsectarian schools instead of public schools," Morland said. "Six states — Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, North Carolina and Virginia — have passed such legislation."

He said:

"Still another way of keeping integration at low levels has been the grade-a-year or stair-step plan."

Morland said that if communities "continue to try to maintain de facto racial segregation in their public schools, they can be assured of two things. It will be futile in the long run, and it will be costly."

He said the federal courts have become "less and less patient" with token integration plans and have "blunted and eliminated" many such plans.

"Federal courts," he concluded, "are not going to permit the continuation of racial schools, and states may well be faced with either closing all of their public schools or extending integration beyond token levels."

NEWPORT NEWS, VA.
PRESS
D. 40,661 S. 60,536
JUL 14 1963

Few Negroes In Integrated Dixie Schools

By HOYT HARWELL

ATLANTA, Ga. (AP) — Fewer than one in 100 Negro pupils in 11 Southern states are attending desegregated schools, a study showed today.

The study, "Token Integration and Beyond," was published by the Anti-Defamation league of B'rith and the Southern Regional Council, a nonprofit, nonpolitical, biracial research and educational organization.

A professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College in Lynchburg, Va., J. Kenneth Morland, summarized the findings.

He said continued segregation was a result of "fear of integration itself" and "subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive" of 1954 which ruled public school segregation unconstitutional.

The study, based on compilations in November 1962, showed that Alabama, Mississippi and South Carolina had no integration at all in public primary and secondary schools.

Morland's findings dealt with Southern and border states school districts. They showed that 31.8 per cent of biracial districts have been desegregated in the area.

An over-all percentage of 90.6 was listed for Delaware. District of Columbia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia.

In the 11 other states, which Morland labeled "resistant" toward desegregation, 11.8 per cent of the districts have been desegregated.

States in which all school districts have been desegregated were listed as Delaware, Maryland and West Virginia, plus the District of Columbia.

In the "resistant" states, .4 per cent of the Negro pupils were in desegregated schools. In the other "compliant" states, Morland said, the percentage was 51.1.

He said that state legislatures

ASBURY PARK EVENING PRESS
ASBURY PARK, N. J.
D. 40,080 S. 39,701
JUL 14 1963

Racial Mixing In Southern Schools Lags

ATLANTA (AP) — Fewer than one in 100 Negro pupils in 11 Southern states are attending desegregated schools, a study showed today.

The study, "Token Integration and Beyond," was published by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith and the Southern Regional Council, a nonprofit, nonpolitical, biracial research and educational organization.

A professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College in Lynchburg, Va., J. Kenneth Morland, summarized the findings.

He said continued segregation was a result of "fear of integration itself" and "subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive" of 1954 which ruled public school segregation unconstitutional.

The study, based on compilations in November 1962, showed that Alabama, Mississippi, and South Carolina had no integration at all in public primary and secondary schools.

Mr. Morland's findings dealt with Southern and border states school districts. They showed that 31.8 per cent of biracial districts have been desegregated in the area.

Percentage High

An over-all percentage of 90.6 was listed for Delaware, District of Columbia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma, and West Virginia.

In the 11 other states, which Mr. Morland labeled "resistant" to desegregation, 11.8 per cent of the districts have been desegregated.

States in which all school districts have been desegregated were listed as Delaware, Maryland, and West Virginia, plus the District of Columbia.

In the "resistant" states, .4 per cent of the Negro pupils were in desegregated schools. In the other "compliant" states, Mr. Morland said, the percentage was 51.1.

He said that state legislatures districts. They showed that 31.8 per cent of biracial districts have been desegregated in the area.

An over-all percentage of 90.6 was listed for Delaware. District of Columbia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia.

In the 11 other states, which Morland labeled "resistant" toward desegregation, 11.8 per cent of the districts have been desegregated.

States in which all school districts have been desegregated were listed as Delaware, Maryland and West Virginia, plus the District of Columbia.

In the "resistant" states, .4 per cent of the Negro pupils were in desegregated schools. In the other "compliant" states, Morland said, the percentage was 51.1.

He said that state legislatures have passed at least 379 laws since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling.

"A basic method for keeping desegregation in public schools at token levels has been through the adoption of pupil placement laws," he said.

In actual operation, Morland contended, these laws "have been used with the assumption that initial assignments could be by race. Negroes have been assigned to all-Negro schools and whites to all-white schools, even though ostensibly on criteria other than race."

The professor added:

"In practice, the children who have applied for transfers from schools to which members of their race have been assigned have almost always been Negroes. Thus actual integration of schools has depended upon whether Negro parents and their children were willing to go through time-consuming, expensive steps to contest the initial assignment."

A second anti-integration method, he said, has been "local option" provisions which allow communities to close schools ordered to desegregate.

"Another device for avoiding integrated schools has been the offer of tuition grants to allow pupils to attend private, nonsectarian schools instead of public schools," Morland said. "Six states — Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, North Carolina and Virginia — have passed such legislation."

He said:

"Still another way of keeping integration at low levels has been the grade-a-year or stair-step plan."

Morland said that if communities "continue to try to maintain de facto racial segregation in their public schools, they can be assured of two things. It will be futile in the long run, and it will be costly."

He said the federal courts have become "less and less patient" with token integration plans and have "blunted and eliminated" many such plans.

"Federal courts," he concluded, "are not going to permit the continuation of racial schools, and states may well be faced with either closing all of their public schools or extending integration beyond token levels."

---

constitutional.

The study, based on compilations in November 1962, showed that Alabama, Mississippi, and South Carolina had no integration at all in public primary and secondary schools.

Mr. Morland's findings dealt with Southern and border states school districts. They showed that 31.8 per cent of biracial districts have been desegregated in the area.

Percentage High

An over-all percentage of 90.6 was listed for Delaware, District of Columbia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma, and West Virginia.

In the 11 other states, which Mr. Morland labeled "resistant" to desegregation, 11.8 per cent of the districts have been desegregated.

States in which all school districts have been desegregated were listed as Delaware, Maryland, and West Virginia, plus the District of Columbia.

In the "resistant" states, .4 per cent of the Negro pupils were in desegregated schools. In the other "compliant" states, Mr. Morland said, the percentage was 51.1.

He said that state legislatures have passed at least 379 laws since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling.

"A basic method for keeping desegregation in public schools at token levels has been through the adoption of pupil placement laws," he said.

Evasion Detailed

In actual operation, Mr. Morland contended, these laws "have been used with the assumption that initial assignments could be by race. Negroes have been assigned to all-Negro schools and whites to all-white schools, even though ostensibly on criteria other than race."

The professor added:

"In practice, the children who have applied for transfers from schools to which members of their race have been assigned have almost always been Negroes. Thus actual integration of schools has depended upon whether Negro parents and their children were willing to go through time-consuming, expensive steps to contest the initial assignment."

A second anti-integration method, he said, has been "local option" provisions which allow communities to close schools ordered to desegregate.

"Another device for avoiding integrated schools has been the offer of tuition grants to allow pupils to attend private, nonsectarian schools instead of public schools," Mr. Morland said. "Six states—Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia Louisiana, North Carolina, and Virginia—have passed such legislation."

He said:

A Third Plan

"Still another way of keeping integration at low levels has been the grade-a-year or stair-step plan."

Mr. Morland said that if communities "continue to try to maintain de facto racial segregation in their public schools, they can be assured of two things. It will be futile in the long run, and it will be costly."

He said the federal courts have become "less and less patient" with token integration plans and have "blunted and eliminated" many such plans.

"Federal courts," he concluded, "are not going to permit the continuation of racial schools, and states may well be faced with either closing all of their public schools or extending integration beyond token levels."

OAKLAND, CALIF.
TRIBUNE
D. 197,851 S. 225,824
PAGE ONE
CERTIFIED
JUL 14 1963

Dixie Stalls On School Integration

Less Than One in 200 Attend Mixed Schools in 11 States

ATLANTA, Ga. (AP) — Fewer than one in 200 Negro pupils in 11 Southern states are attending desegregated schools, a study showed today.

The study, "Token Integration and Beyond," was published by the Anti-Defamation league of B'nai B'rith and the Southern Regional Council, a nonprofit, nonpolitical, biracial research and educational organization.

A professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College in Lynchburg, Va., J. Kenneth Morland, summarized the findings.

He said continued segregation was a result of "fear of integration itself" and "subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive" of 1954 which ruled public school segregation unconstitutional.

The study, based on compilations in November 1962, showed that Alabama, Mississippi and South Carolina had no integration at all in public primary and secondary schools.

AREA SURVEYED

Morland's findings dealt with Southern and border states school districts. They showed that 31.8 per cent of biracial districts have been desegregated in the area.

An over-all percentage of 90.6 was listed for Delaware, District of Columbia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia.

In the 11 other states, which Moreland labeled "resistant" toward desegregation, 11.8 per cent of the districts have been desegregated.

States in which all school districts have been desegregated were listed as Delaware, Maryland and West Virginia, plus the District of Columbia.

In the "resistant" states, .4 per cent of the Negro pupils were in desegregated schools. In the other "compliant" states, Morland said, the percentage was 51.1.

LEGAL DODGES

He said that state legislatures have passed at least 379 laws since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling.

"A basic method for keeping desegregation in public schools at token levels has been through the adoption of pupil placement laws," he said.

In actual operation, Morland contended, these laws "have been used with the assumption that initial assignments could be by race.

"Negroes have been assigned to all-Negro schools and whites to all-white schools, even though ostensibly on criteria other than race."

The professor added:

"In practice, the children who have applied for transfers from schools to which members of their race have been assigned have almost always been Negroes.

"Thus actual integration of schools has depended upon whether Negro parents and their children were willing to go through time-consuming, expensive steps to contest the initial assignment."

Continued Page 4, Col. 1

South Lags On School Integration

Continued from Page 1

A second anti-integration method, he said, has been "local option" provisions which allow communities to close schools ordered to desegregate.

"Another device for avoiding integrated schools has been the offer of tuition grants to allow pupils to attend private, nonsectarian schools instead of public schools," Morland said. "Six states — Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, North Carolina and Virginia—have passed such legislation."

He said:

"Still another way of keeping integration at low levels has been the grade-a-year or stair-step plan."

Morland said that if communities "continue to try to maintain de facto racial segregation in their public schools, they can be assured of two things. It will be futile in the long run, and it will be costly."

He said the federal courts have become "less and less patient" with token integration plans and have "blunted and eliminated" many such plans.

"Federal courts," he concluded, "are not going to permit the continuation of racial schools, and states may well be faced with either closing all of their public schools or extending integration beyond token

Trenton Sunday
Times Advertiser
TRENTON, N. J.
SUN. 71,397

JUL 14 1963

'Token' Measures Assailed

Integration In Southern Schools Is Still Far Off, Survey Shows

ATLANTA, Ga. (AP) — Fewer than one in 100 Negro pupils in 11 Southern states are attending desegregated schools, a study showed today.

The study, "Token Integration and Beyond," was published by the Anti-Defamation league of B'rith and the Southern Regional Council, a nonprofit, nonpolitical, biracial research and educational organiaztion.

A professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College in Lynchburg, Va., J. Kenneth Morland, summarized the findings.

He said continued segregation was a result of "fear of integration itself" and "subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive" of 1954 which ruled public school segregation unconstitutional.

3 States Still Segregated

The study, based on compilations in November 1962, showed that Alabama, Mississippi and South Carolina had no integration at all in public primary and secondary schools.

Moreland's findings dealt with Southern and border states school districts. They showed that 31.8 per cent of biracial districts have been desegregated in the area.

An over-all percentage of 90.6 was listed for Delaware, District of Columbia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia.

In the 11 other states, which Morland labeled "resistant" toward desegregation, 11.8 per cent of the districts have been desegregated.

States in which all school districts have been desegregated were listed as Delaware, Maryland and West Virginia, plus the District of Columbia.

In the "resistant" states, .4 per cent of the Negro pupils were in desegregated schools. In the other "compliant" states, Morland said, the percentage was 51.1.

He said that state legislatures have passed at least 379 laws since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling.

Placement Laws

"A basic method for keeping desegregation in public schools at token levels has been through the adoption of pupil placement laws," he said.

In actual operation, Morland contended, these laws "have been used with the assumption that initial assignments could be by race. Negroes have been assigned to all-Negro schools and whites to all-white schools, even though ostensibly on criteria other than race."

The professor added:

"In practice, the children who have applied for transfers from schools to which members of their race have been assigned have almost always been Negroes. Thus actual integration of schools has depended upon whether Negro parents and their children were willing to go through time-consuming, expensive steps to contest the initial assignment."

Other Devices

A second anti - integration method, he said, has been "local option" provisions which allow communities to close schools ordered to desegregate.

"Another device for avoiding integrated schools has been the offer of tuition grants to allow pupils to attend private, nonsectarian schools instead of public schools," Morland said. "Six states — Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, North Carolina and Virginia — have passed such legislation."

He said:

"Still another way of keeping integration at low levels has been the grade-a-year or stair-step plan."

Morland said that if communities "continue to try to maintain de facto racial segregation in their public schools, they can be assured of two things. It will be futile in the long run, and it will be costly."

Courts Impatient

He said the federal courts have become "less and less patient" with token integration plans and have "blunted and eliminated" many such plans.

"Federal courts," he concluded, "are not going to permit the continuation of racial schools, and states may well be faced with either closing all of their public schools or extending integration beyond token levels."

NEW YORK
Herald Tribune
D. 355,898 S. 451,270

JUL 14 1963

The Schools in South: A Token of Integration

By The Associated Press

ATLANTA.

Fewer than one in 100 Negro pupils in 11 Southern states are attending desegregated schools, a study showed yesterday.

The study, "Token Integration and Beyond," was published by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith and the Southern Regional Council, a non-profit, non-political, bi-racial research and educational organization.

A professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College in Lynchburg, Va., J. Kenneth Morland, summarized the findings.

He said continued segregation was a result of "fear of integration itself" and "subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive" of 1954 which ruled public school segregation unconstitutional.

The study, based on compilations in November, 1962, showed that Alabama, Mississippi and South Carolina had no integration at all in public primary and secondary schools.

Prof. Morland's findings dealt with Southern and border states school districts. They showed that 31.8 per cent of bi-racial districts have been desegregated in the area.

An over-all percentage of 90.6 was listed for Delaware, District of Columbia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia.

In the 11 other states, which Prof. Morland labeled "resistant" toward desegregation, 11.8 per cent of the districts have been desegregated.

State Legislatures have passed 379 laws since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling.

States in which all school districts have been desegregated were listed as Delaware, Maryland and West Virginia, plus the District of Columbia.

"A basic method for keeping desegragation in public schools at token levels has been through the adoption of pupil placement laws," Prof. Morland said.

In operation, he contended, these laws "have been used with the assumption that initial assignments could be by race. Negroes have been assigned to all-Negro schools and whites to all-white schools, even though ostensibly on criteria other than race."

The Professor added:

"In practice, the children who have applied for transfers from schools to which members of their race have been assigned have almost always been Negroes. Thus, actual integration of schools has depended upon whether Negro parents and their children were willing to go through time-consuming, expensive steps to contest the initial assignment."

"Federal courts," he concluded, "are not going to permit the continuation of racial schools, and states may well be faced with either closing all of their public schools or extending integration beyond token levels."

DANVILLE, VA.
REGISTER
D. 10,267 S. 20,902
JUL 14 1963

Study Shows

Fewer Than One In 100 Negro Pupils In 11 Dixie States Attending Integrated Units

ATLANTA, Ga. (AP) — Fewer than one in 100 Negro pupils in 11 Southern states are attending desegregated schools, a study showed today.

The study, "Token Integration and Beyond," was published by the anti-Defamation league of B'nai B'rith and the Southern Regional Council, a nonprofit, nonpolitical biracial research and educational organization.

A professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College in Lynchburg, Va., J. Kenneth Morland, summarized the findings.

He said continued segregation was a result of "fear of integration itself" and "subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive" of 1954 which ruled public school segregation unconstitutional.

The study, based on compilations in November 1962, showed that Alabama, Mississippi and South Carolina had no integration at all in public primary and secondary schools.

Moreland's findings dealt with Southern and border states school districts. They showed that 31.8 per cent of biracial districts have been desegregated in the area.

An over-all percentage of 90.6 was listed for Delaware, District of Columbia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia.

In the 11 other states, which Morland labeled "resistant" toward desegregation, 11.8 per cent of the districts have been desegregated.

States in which all school districts have been desegregated were listed as Delaware, Maryland and West Virginia, plus the District of Columbia.

In the "resistant" states, .4 per cent of the Negro pupils were in desegregated schools. In the other "compliant" states, Morland said, the percentage was 51.1.

He said that state legislatures have passed at least 379 laws since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling.

"A basic method for keeping desegregation in public schools at token levels has been through the adoption of pupil placement laws," he said.

In actual operation, Morland contended, these laws "have been used with the assumption that initial assignments could be by race. Negroes have been assigned to all-Negro schools and whites to all-white schools, even though ostensibly n criteria other than race."

The professor added:

"In practice, the children who have applied for transfers from schools to which members of their race have been assigned have almost always been Negroes. Thus actual integration of schools has depended upon whether Negro parents and their children were willing to go through time-consuming, expensive steps to contest the initial assignment."

A second anti-integration method, he said, has been "local option" provisions which allow communities to close schools ordered to desegregate.

"Another device for avoiding integrated schools has been the offer of tuition grants to allow pupils to attend private, nonsectarian schools instead of public schools," Morland said. "Six states — Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, North Carolina and Virginia — have passed such legislation."

He said:

"Still another way of keeping integration at low levels has been the grade-a-year or stair-step plan."

Morland said that if communities "continue to try to maintain de facto racial segregation in their public schools, they can be assured of two things. It will be futile in the long run, and it will be costly."

He said the federal courts have become "less and less patient" with token integration plans and have "blunted and eliminated" many such plans.

"Federal courts," he concluded, "are not going to permit the continuation of racial schools, and states may well be faced with either closing all of their public schools or extending integration beyond token levels."

THE PLAIN DEALER
CLEVELAND, OHIO
D. 336,210 S. 507,694
JUL 14 1963

Find School Segregation Continuing

By ROBERT C. DOTY
© New York Times Service

NEW YORK — Subterfuge and bad faith in the operation of "Token Integration" plans in 11 southern states have maintained racial segregation virtually intact nine years after the Supreme Court outlawed it.

Recent federal district court and high court rulings. however, give hope of ending the evasive tactics of the "resistant" states and forcing the Deep South to speedier compliance with integration laws.

These are the major conclusions o fa new report, "Token Desegregation and Beyond," issued yesterday by the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta and the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith in New York.

Author is J. Kenneth Morland, professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College, Lynchburg, Va.

Morland reports that only 4/10ths of 1% of all the Negroes in the 11 most recalcitrant states were attending schools with white children. They are Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North and South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

EVEN ADDING the better record of the "compliant" states—Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Oklahoma and West Virginia—and the District of Columbia leaves approximately 92 out of each 100 Negroes in the southern and border states attending segregated classes.

In the 11 "resistant" states only 11.8% of the biracial school districts had been even nominally desegregated.

By contrast, in the "compliant" border states 90.6% of the biracial districts had integrated their schools in November, 1962.

"Token integration operates on the bases of fear and subterfuge," the author writes. "Fear of integration itself and subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive. While difficult problems can arise as communities change a biracial school system into a nonracial one, compliant states have demonstrated that this change can be made creatively and successfully."

Recent ruling by U.S. Circuit Courts and the Supreme Court, the author says, have begun to recognize "token" plans as evasions of the law and to outlaw them.

Among them are pupil placement plans and restrictive transfer provisions.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
TIMES
D. 52,218 S. 82,245
PAGE ONE CERTIFIED
JUL 14 1963

DEEP SOUTH BIAS IN SCHOOLROOMS IS NEARLY INTACT

Under 1% of Negroes in 11 States Are Attending Classes With Whites

By ROBERT C. DOTY
© New York Times News Service

NEW YORK — Subterfuge and bad faith in the operation of "token integration" plans in 11 Southern states have maintained school racial segregation virtually intact nine years after the Supreme Court outlawed it.

Recent federal district court and high court rulings, however, now give hope of bringing to an end the evasive tactics of the "resistant" states and force the Deep South to speedier compliance with the desegregation laws.

These are the major conclusions of a new report, "Token Desegregation and Beyond," issued Saturday by the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta and the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith in New York.

High Cost of Resistance

The author of the report is J. Kenneth Morland, professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College, Lynchburg, Va. He stresses also the high cost — in money, lost educational facilities and violence to democratic principles—of the Southern resistance.

Morland reports that only fourtenth of 1 per cent of all the Negroes in the 11 most recalcitrant states are attending schools with white children. These states are Alabama, Arkansas, Floria, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North and South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

Even adding the better record of the "compliant" states—Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia and the District of Columbia leaves approximately 92 out of each 100 Negroes in the Southern and border states attending segregated classes.

Nominal Desegregation

In the 11 "resistant" states only 11.8 per cent of the biracial school districts have been even nominally desegregated and even this inadequate performance is more apparent than real, the report said.

By contrast, in the "compliant" border states 90.6 per cent of the biracial districts had desegregated their schools in November 1962. Delaware, Maryland, West Virginia and the District of Columbia have desegregated all their school districts.

Morland calls "token" desegregation those measures designed to offer nominal and technical compliance with the Supreme Court ruling but to maintain full, or very nearly full segregation in fact.

"Token integration operates on the bases of fear and subterfuge," the author writes. "Fear of integration itself and subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive. While difficult problems can arise as communities change a biracial school system into a nonracial one, compliant states have demonstrated that this change can be made creatively and successfully."

See Page Two, Column Seven

DEEP SOUTH BIAS IS NEARLY INTACT

From Page One

Recent rulings by U.S. circuit courts and the Supreme Court, the author says, have begun to recognize these "token" plans as evasions of the law and to outlaw them.

Among them are pupil placement plans and restrictive transfer provisions. The first type gives to school boards the right to assign pupils individually to specific schools, with no specific mention made of race among the criteria for selection. But in practice, the boards assign Negroes and whites alike to schools in which all or nearly all the attendance is of the same race.

Appeals Complex, Costly

Such laws, Morland finds, have provisions for appeal from such assignments but these are so complex and costly to pursue that few petitioners have the energy or resources to carry litigation to a successful conclusion.

Restrictive transfer provisions have been widely used to lessen or nullify the effect of the so-called "grade - a - year" desegregation plans adopted in some school districts, in nominal compliance, the report found.

Under these plans, one grade is desegregated each year and children of both races are assigned to schools nearest their homes. But, by administrative decision, white children assigned to predominantly Negro schools and Negroes attending schools with a white majority have been freely granted transfers to schools of their own race. But transfers in the other direction, to white schools by Negroes or, in the rare cases that might have arisen, to Negro schools by whites, are not permitted.

A Resegregation

The result has been to rapidly resegregate the desegregated classes, the report states.

Other evasions have been accomplished by giving local communities the option of closing down public schools ordered to desegregate and by tuition grants by states to permit pupils to attend segregated private schools.

The pupil placement plan has been condemned in the circuit court in a decision that said it is not compatible with the "deliberate speed" concept and that "it is not a plan for desegregation at all." At the time of writing of the report the Supreme Court had still to affirm or reject this ruling.

The high court, however, has already ruled unanimously that two representative pupil transfer plans are unconstitutional.

In later sections of the report, Morland discusses the racial and social fallacies on which resistance to desegregation is based. These include the idea, universally rejected by scientists, that capacity to learn has a direct connection with race and that school desegregation will result in lower educational standards and heightened social tensions.

He dismisses the argument of racial inequality with the statement that "Americans can be treated as individuals rather than as members of races and they can be given equal opportunity as individuals to develop their abilities without fear of any consequences known to science."

He quotes those in the forefront of the desegregation movement—notably in Louisville and Baltimore—to show that desegregation of schools has improved educational standards and coincided with, if not actually caused, a decline in juvenile delinquency.

This effect, he argues, might be even more marked if the millions spent by the resistant states on legislation and litigation to block desegregation were to be devoted to educational purposes.

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
D. 178,553 S. 283,819

JUL 14 1963

Shady Token Integration Charged to 'Deep South'

By ROBERT C. DOTY
(New York Times News Service)

NEW YORK—Subterfuge and bad faith in the operation of "token integration" plans in 11 Southern states have maintained racial segregation virtually intact nine years after the Supreme Court outlawed it.

Recent federal district court and high court rulings, however, now give hope of bringing to an end the evasive tactics of the "resistant" states and thus force the Deep South to speedier compliance with the integration laws.

CHIEF CONCLUSIONS

These are the major conclusions of a new report, "token desegregation and beyond," issued by the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta and the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith in New York.

The author of the report is J. Kenneth Morland, professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College, Lynchburg, Va. He stresses also the high cost—in money, lost educational facilities and violence to democratic principles—of the Southern resistance.

Morland reports that only four-tenths of one per cent of all the Negroes in the 11 most recalcitrant states were attending schools with white children. They are Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North and South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

Even adding the better record of the "compliant" states—Delaware Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia—and the District of Columbia leaves approximately 92 out of each 100 Negroes in the Southern and border states attending segregated classes.

VERY LITTLE DONE

In the 11 "resistant" states only 11.8 per cent of the bi-racial school districts had been even nominally desegregated and even this inadequate performance was more apparent than real, the report said.

By contrast, in the "compliant" border states 90.6 per cent of the bi-racial districts had integrated their schools in November, 1962. Delaware, Maryland, West Virginia and the District of Columbia had desegregated all of their school districts.

Morland calls "token" integration those measures designed to offer nominal and technical compliance with the Supreme Court ruling but to maintain full, or very nearly full segregation in fact.

"Token integration operates on the basis of fear and subterfuge," the author writes. "Fear of integration itself and subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive. While difficult problems can arise as communities change a bi-racial school system into a non-racial one, compliant states have demonstrated that this change can be made creatively and successfully."

OMAHA, NEBR.
WORLD-HERALD (MORNING)
D: 126,435 S. 268,388

JUL 14 1963

'Token Plans Not Even Token'

© New York Times Service.

New York—Subterfuge and bad faith in the operation of "token integration plans in 11 Southern states have maintained segregation virtually intact nine years after the Supreme Court outlawed it.

Recent Federal court rulings, however, give hope of stopping the evasive tactics of the "resistant" states and force the Deep South to speedier compliance with integration laws.

These are the major conclusions of a new report, "Token Desegregation and Beyond," issued Saturday by the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta and the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith in New York.

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D.C.
D. 408,701 S. 491,212

JUL 14 1963

Report Shows South's Fight to Keep Schools Segregated Has Been Costly

By Susanna McBee
Staff Reporter

Southern efforts to fight school integration heve kept all but a few Negroes out of desegregated schools in the 11 Confederate states, but the dollar cost of resistance has been high.

This conclusion is contained in a 27-page report published yesterday by the Southern Regional Council and the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith and written by J. Kenneth Morland, professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College in Lynchburg, Va.

It has been nine years since the Supreme Court ruled that school segregation is unconstitutional, but today only four-tenths of one per cent of the Negro students in the Old Confederacy are attending desegregated schools, Morland noted.

The "resistant" Confederate states are Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

In the District of Columbia and six "compliant" states—Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma, and West Virginia—51.1 per cent of Negro students are in school with white students. The percentage of Negroes in desegregated schools throughout the South—"resistant" and "compliant" states combined—is 7.8 as of last November, the report showed.

If the "resistant" states continue to resist, they can be assured of two things, Morland said—"It will be futile in the long run, and it will be costly."

For instance, as of last November, 293 school cases had been filed in Federal and state courts. Figuring the cost of each case at $15,000, Morland estimated the total cost at $4,395,000.

Another cost has been that of drawing up and passing legislation designed to prevent or slow down integration. Morland said 379 such laws were passed by 16 Southern state legislatures after the 1954 decision. An "enormous amount of time, effort, talent and money" went into these laws, many of which have been declared unconstitutional, the professor observed.

Tuition grants have been costly, too. In five years, Virginia has paid more than $7.7 million, Morland said. Georgia paid $216,987 last year, and Louisiana paid $850,216 in the first four months of the last school year.

"Less tangible but perhaps more significant" costs involve the "handicapping of school administrators in improving the quality of education in the public schools," he said.

"With so much time, energy, and money spent in keeping certain children out of certain schools," he added, "less time, effort, and money have been available for strengthening the educational program itself."

HOUSTON, TEXAS
POST
D. 220,491 S. 243,883

JUL 14 1963

Slow Desegregation Of Southern Schools Cited

ATLANTA — (AP) — Fewer than one in 200 Negro pupils in 11 Southern states are attending desegregated schools, a study showed Sunday.

The study, "Token Integration and Beyond," was published by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith and the Southern Regional Council, a non-profit, non-political, biracial research and educational organization.

A PROFESSOR of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College in Lynchburg, Va, J. Kenneth Morland, summarized the findings.

He said continued segregation was a result of "fear of integration itself" and "subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive" of 1954 which ruled public school segregation unconstitutional.

The study, based on compilations in November, 1962, showed that Alabama, Mississippi and South Carolina had no desegregation at all in public and primary and secondary schools.

Morland's findings dealt with Southern and border states school districts. They showed that 31.8 per cent of bi-racial districts have been desegregated in the area.

AN OVER-ALL percentage of 90.6 was listed for Delaware, District of Columbia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia.

In the 11 other states, which Morland labeled "resistant" toward desegregation, 11.8 per cent of the districts have been desegregated.

States in which all school districts have been desegregated were listed as Delaware, Maryland and West Virginia, plus the District of Columbia.

In the "resistant" states, .4 per cent of the Negro pupils were in desegregated schools. In the other "compliant" states, Morland said, the percentage was 51.1.

HE SAID that state legislatures have passed at least 379 laws since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling.

"A basic method for keeping desegregation in public schools at token levels has been through the adoption of pupil placement laws," he said.

In actual operation, Morland contended, these laws "have been used with the assumption that initial assignments could be by race. Negroes have been assigned to all-Negro schools and whites to all-white schools, even though ostensibly on criteria other than race."

THE PROFESSOR added:

"In practice, the children who gave applied for transfers from schools to which members of their race have been assigned have almost always been Negroes. Thus actual desegregation of schools has depended upon whether Negro parents and their children were willing to go through time-consuming, expensive steps to contest the initial assignment."

A second anti-desegregation method, he said, has been "local option" provisions which allow communities to close schools ordered to desegregate.

"Another device for avoiding integrated schools has been the offer of tuition grants to allow pupils to attend private, nonsectarian schools instead of public schools," Morland said. "Six states — Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, North Carolina and Virginia — have passed such legislation."

He said:

"Still another way of keeping integration at low levels has been the grade-a-year or stairstep plan."

MORLAND SAID that if communities "continue to try to maintain de facto racial segregation in their public schools, they can be assured of two things. It will be futile in the long run, and it will be costly."

AUGUSTA, GA.
CHRONICLE-HERALD
SUN. - CIRC.N.AVAIL.
JUL 14 1963

'Token' integration study reveals delay

ATLANTA, Ga. (AP)—Fewer than one in 100 Negro pupils in 11 Southern states are attending desegregated schools, a study showed

The study, "Token Integration and Beyond," was published by the Anti-Defamation league of B'rith and the Southern Regional Council, a nonprofit, nonpolitical, biracial research and educational organization.

A professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College in Lynchburg, Va., J. Kenneth Morland, summarized the findings.

Fear, Subterfuge

He said continued segregation was a result of "fear of integration itself" and "subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive" of 1954 which ruled public school segregation unconstitutional.

The study, based on compilations in November 1962, showed that Alabama, Mississippi and South Carolina had no integration at all in public primary and secondary schools.

Moreland's findings dealt with Southern and border states school districts. They showed that 31.8 per cent of biracial districts have been desegregated in the area.

An over-all percentage of 90.6 was listed for Delaware, District of Columbia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia.

Resistant States

In the 11 other states, which Morland labeled "resistant" toward desegregation, 11.8 per cent of the districts have been desegregated.

States in which all school districts have been desegregated were listed as Delaware, Maryland and West Virginia, plus the District of Columbia.

In the "resistant" states, .4 per cent of the Negro pupils were in desegregated schools. In the other "compliant" states, Morland said, the percentage was 51.1.

He said that state legislatures have passed at least 379 laws since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling.

"A basic method for keeping desegregation in public schools at token levels has been through the adoption of pupil placement laws," he said.

Ostensible Criteria

In actual operation, Morland contended, these laws "have been used with the assumption that initial assignments could be by race. Negroes have been assigned to all-Negro schools and whites to all-white schools, even though ostensibly on criteria other than race."

The professor added:

"In practice, the children who have applied for transfers from schools to which members of their race have been assigned have almost always been Negroes. Thus actual integration of schools has depended upon whether Negro parents and their children were willing to go through time-consuming, expensive steps to contest the initial assignment."

A second anti-integration method, he said, has been "local option" provisions which allow communities to close schools ordered to desegregate.

Morland said that if communities "continue to try to maintain de facto racial segregation in their public schools, they can be assured of two things. It will be futile in the long run, and it will be costly."

BOSTON, MASS.
ADVERTISER
SUN. 448,810

JUL 14 1963

Integration in Dixie Schools Fou

ATLANTA (UPI)—A new report on the progress of school desegreation said that fewer than one out of 200 Negro children in 11 southern states are now in integrated classes.

The report, published by Southern Regional Council and the Anti-Defamation League, was prepared by J. Kenneth Morland, professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College, Lynchburg, Va.

The report said the 11 "resistant" states had adopted token integration plans designed "to meet the demands of the Supreme Court by allowing some integration while still keeping the number of Negroes in school with whites at such a low level a facto (in fact

Morland lis ment laws, lo sions with th authorizations and restrictiv

JACKSON, MISS.
CLARION-LEDGER
D. 54,056

JUL 14 1963

LESS THAN 1 IN 200

Dixie's Integrated Schools Still Have Only Few Negroes

ATLANTA (UPI) — A new report on the progress of school desegregation said Saturday that fewer than one out of 200 Negro children in 11 Southern states are now in integrated classes.

The report, published by Southern Regional Council and the Anti-Defamation League, was prepared by J. Kenneth Morland, professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon woman's college. Lynchburg, Va.

The report said the 11 "resistant" states had adopted token integration plans designed "to meet the demands of the Supreme court by allowing some integration while still keeping the number of Negroes in school with whites at such a low level as to maintain de facto (in fact) segregation."

Morland listed pupil placement laws, local option provisions with their school closing authorizations, tuition grants and restrictive transfer plans as the main programs that have kept 99.6 per cent of the Negroes in schools of the 11 states in segregated classes.

Morland singled out as the "resistant" states Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

STATES THAT COMPLIED

Previously - segregated areas that have "complied" with the 1954 Supreme Court school desegregation decision were listed as Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma, West Virginia and the District of Columbia.

Morland pointed out that overall school desegregation statistics fail to show the slow pace in the deep South and in some cases hide the facts inside the South.

He noted that statistics show Nashville, Tenn., with 810 Negroes in schools with whites but that actually 540 of them were in a school with a single white child and a Chinese-American.

Of the 270 desegregated districts in the "resistant" states last fall, 176 were in Texas alone, he said.

"Racial integration in public schools is by any standard at token levels in resistant states, where 98 per cent of the Negro pupils in desegregated districts and 99.6 per cent in all school districts are in segregated schools," Morland concluded.

SEGREGATION FUTILE

The federal courts "are not going to permit the continuation of racial schools," Morland emphasized. He said de facto segregation would be "futile in the long run" and very costly.

On the basis of a Civil Rights Commission estimate that one racial case costs $15,000, Morland estimated that litigation over the issue already had cost $4,395,000. There have been 223 cases in "resistant" states and 70 in the others.

He estimated the cost of extraordinary legislative sessions on the race question at $934,000, $7,750,000 for 38,000 tuition grants to children who refused to attend integrated schools and the "less tangible" cost of "handicapping school administrators in improving the quality of education in the public schools."

"Another cost of token integration is the keeping of the race issue alive, the catering to racial prejudice and the giving of false hope to segregationists," Morland wrote.

He said that fear of social troubles and lowering of academic standards governed much of the reluctance to move into integrated programs.

xie Schools Found Moving at Slow Pace nd, sistant" states had adopted toue, ken integration plans designed th "to meet the demands of the gy Supreme Court by allowing n's some integration while still keeping the number of Negroes re- in school with whites at such a low level as to maintain de facto (in fact) segregation."

Morland listed pupil placement laws, local option provisions with their school closing authorizations, tuition grants and restrictive transfer plans as the main programs that have kept 99.6 per cent of the Negroes in schools of the 11 states in segregated classes.

Morland singled out as the "resistant" states Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

Previously-segregated areas that have "complied" with the 1954 Supreme Court school desegregation decision were listed as Delaware, Kentucky, Mar land, Missouri, Oklahoma, We Virginia and the District Columbia.

Morland pointed out th overall school desegregati statistics fail to show the sl pace in the deep south

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST-DISPATCH
D. 347,672 S. 564,337

JUL 14 1963

ONLY NOMINAL INTEGRATION IN SOUTH REPORTED

ATLANTA, Ga., July 13 (UPI) —A new report of the progress of school desegregation said today that less than half of 1 per cent of Negro children in 11 Southern states are in integrated classes.

The report, published by the Southern Regional Council and the Anti-Defamation League, was prepared by J. Kenneth Morland, professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College, Lynchburg, Va.

The report said that the 11 states had adopted token integration plans designed "to meet the demands of the Supreme Court by allowing some integration while still keeping the number of Negroes in school with whites at such a low level as to maintain de facto segregation."

The 11 states are Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

CHICAGO, ILL.
CHICAGO'S AMERICAN
D. 444,559 S. 554,928

JUL 14 1963

How 3 Dixie States Block Integration of Schools

BY HOYT HARWELL

ATLANTA (AP) — Fewer than one in 100 Negro pupils in 11 southern states are attending desegregated schools, a recently completed study, "Token Integration and Beyond," shows. It was published by the Anti-Defamation league of B'nai B'rith and the Southern Regional council, a nonprofit, nonpolitical, biracial research and educational organization.

A professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's college in Lynchburg, Va., J. Kenneth Morland, summarized the findings.

He said continued segregation was a result of "fear of integration itself" and "subterfuge in complying with the Supreme court directive" of 1954 which ruled public school segregation unconstitutional.

The study, based on compilations in November, 1962, showed Alabama, Mississippi, and South Carolina had no integration at all in public primary and secondary schools.

Morland's findings dealt with southern and border states school districts. They showed 31.8 per cent of biracial districts have been desegregated in the area.

An over-all percentage of 90.6 was listed for Delaware, District of Columbia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma, and West Virginia.

In the 11 other states, which Morland labeled "resistant" toward desegregation, 11.8 per cent of the districts have been desegregated.

All school districts have been desegregated in Delaware, Maryland, and West Virginia, plus the District of Columbia.

In the "resistant" states, .4 per cent of the Negro pupils were in desegregated schools. In the other "compliant" states, Morland said, the percentage was 51.1.

He said state legislatures have passed at least 379 laws since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme court ruling.

"A basic method for keeping desegregation in public schools at token levels has been thru the adoption of pupil placement laws," he said.

Local Option Method

A second anti-integration method, he said, has been "local option" provisions which allow communities to close schools ordered to desegregate.

"Another device has been the offer of tuition grants to allow pupils to attend private, nonsectarian schools instead of public schools," Morland said. "Six states — Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, North Carolina, and Virginia—have passed such legislation.

"Still another way of keeping integration at low levels has been the grade-a-year or stair-step plan."

Morland said that if communities "continue to try to maintain de facto racial segregation in their public schools, they can be assured of two things. It will be futile in the long run, and it will be costly."

He said the federal courts have become "less and less patient" with token integration plans and have "blunted and eliminated" many such plans.

HOUSTON, TEXAS
CHRONICLE
D. 206,663 S. 243,876

JUL 14 1963

Segregation Still Rules in 11 States

Atlanta (UPI)—A new report on the progress of school desegregation said Saturday fewer than one out of 200 Negro children in 11 Southern states are now in integrated classes.

The report, published by the Southern Regional Council and the Antidefamation League, was prepared by J. Kenneth Morland, professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College, Lynchburg, Va.

The report said the 11 "resistant" states had adopted token integration plans designed "to meet the demands of the Supreme Court by allowing some integration while still keeping the number of Negroes in school with whites at such a low level as to maintain de facto segregation."

Morland listed pupil placement laws, local option provisions with their school closing authorizations, tuition grants and restrictive transfer plans as the main programs that have kept 99.6 per cent of the Negroes in schools of the 11 states in segregated classes.

"Resistant" States

Morland singled out as the "resistant" states Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, North Carolina, South Carolina, Mississippi, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

Previously segregated areas that have "complied" with the 1954 Supreme Court decision were listed as Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma, West Virginia and the District of Columbia.

Morland pointed out over-all school desegregation statistics fail to show the slow pace in the deep South and in some cases hide the facts inside the South.

He noted that statistics show Nashville, Tenn., with 810 Negroes in schools with whites but that actually 540 of them were in a school with a single white child and a Chinese-American.

Of the 270 desegregated districts in the "resistant" states last fall, 174 were in Texas alone, he said.

"Racial integration in public schools is by any standard at token levels in resistant states, where 98 per cent of the Negro pupils in desegregated districts and 99.6 per cent in all school districts are in segregated schools," Morland concluded.

"Futile in Long Run" of false hopes to segregationists," Morland wrote.

He said fear of social troubles and lowering of academic standards governed much of the reluctance to move into integrated programs.

Resolute Firmness

"It has been demonstrated repeatedly that when state and local officials act in resolute firmness there has not been violence or serious opposition in carrying out the mandate of the courts," Morland said.

He said there was "no factual support" for fears that Negro pupils in white schools lower academic standards, adding that some school administrators have testified standards were improved with desegregation.

The S.R.C. was formed in 1944 by white and Negro Southerners with the avowed purpose of advancing "equal opportunity for all the South's people."

tucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma, West Virginia and the District of Columbia.

Morland pointed out over-all school desegregation statistics fail to show the slow pace in the deep South and in some cases hide the facts inside the South.

He noted that statistics show Nashville, Tenn., with 810 Negroes in schools with whites but that actually 540 of them were in a school with a single white child and a Chinese-American.

Of the 270 desegregated districts in the "resistant" states last fall, 174 were in Texas alone, he said.

"Racial integration in public schools is by any standard at token levels in resistant states, where 98 per cent of the Negro pupils in desegregated districts and 99.6 per cent in all school districts are in segregated schools," Morland concluded.

"Futile in Long Run"

The federal courts "are not going to permit the continuation of racial schools," Morland said. He said de facto segregation would be "futile in the long run" and very costly.

On the basis of a civil rights commission estimate that one racial case costs $15,000, Morland estimated litigation over the issue already had cost $4,395,000. There have been 223 cases in "resistant" states and 70 in the others.

He estimated the cost of extraordinary legislative sessions on the race question at $934,000, $7,750,000 for 38,000 tuition grants to children who refused to attend integrated schools and the "less tangible" cost of "handicapping school administrators in improving the quality of education in the public schools."

"Another cost of token integration is the keeping of the race issue alive, the catering to racial prejudice and the giving

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES-DISPATCH
D. 140,135 S. 188,901
JUL 14 1963

Study Shows Most Souther

From T-D Wire Dispatches

Fewer than one in 100 Negro pupils in 11 Southern states are attending desegregated schools, a study prepared by a Virginia college professor shows.

The study, "Token Integration and Beyond," was published by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith and the Southern Regional Council, a nonprofit, nonpolitical biracial research and educational organization. The study's author is J. Kenneth Morland, professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College in Lynchburg.

PROFESSOR MORLAND says in his report, released yesterday, that subterfuge and bad faith in the operation of "token integration" plans in 11 states have maintained racial segregation virtually intact nine years after the Supreme Court outlawed it.

Only four-tenths of one per cent of the Negroes in 11 Southern states were attending schools with white children, compilations in November, 1962, showed.

These states are Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North and South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

Even adding the better record of the "compliant" states—Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia—and the District of Columbia leaves approximately 92 out of each 100 Negroes in the Southern and border states attending segregated classes.

IN THE 11 "resistant" states only 11.8 per cent of the biracial school districts had been even nominally desegregated and even this inadequate performance was more apparent than real, the report said.

By contrast, in the "compliant" border states 90.6 per cent of the biracial districts had integrated their schools in November, 1962. Delaware, Maryland, West Virginia and the District of Columbia had desegregated all their school districts.

Morland calls "token" integration those measures designed to offer nominal and technical compliance with the Supreme Court ruling but to maintain full, or very nearly full, segregation in fact.

RECENT RULINGS by United States circuit courts and the Supreme Court, the author says, have begun to recognize these "token" plans as evasions of the law and to outlaw them.

Among them are pupil placement plans and restrictive transfer provisions. The first type gives to school boards the right to assign pupils individually to specific schools, with no specific mention made of race among the criteria for selection, but in practice, the boards assign Negroes and whites alike to schools in which all or nearly all of the attendance is of the same race.

Such laws, Morland finds, have provisions for appeal from such assignments thern Schools Still Segregated gated all their n" integration

l to offer nomi-
liance with the but to maintain
, segregation in

by United States Supreme Court, begun to recog-
s as evasions of them.
upil placement
nsfer provisions.
o school boards
pils individually no specific men-the criteria for ce, the boards whites alike to nearly all of the ame race.
nds, have provi-
uch assignments

but these are so complex and costly to pursue that few petitioners have the energy or resources to carry litigation to a successful conclusion.

RESTRICTIVE TRANSFER provisions have been widely used to lessen or nullify the effect of the so-called "grade A year" desegregation plans adopted in some school districts, in nominal compliance, the report found.

Under these plans, one grade is desegregated each year and children of both races are assigned to schools nearest their homes, but, by administrative decision, white children assigned to predominantly Negro schools and Negroes attending schools with a white majority have been freely granted transfers to schools of their own race. But transfers in the other direction, to white schools by Negroes or, in the rare cases that might have arisen, to Negro schools by whites, are not permitted.

The resulted has been rapidly to resegregate the integrated classes, the report states.

OTHER EVASIONS have been accomplished by giving local communities the option of closing public schools ordered to desegregate and by tuition grants by states to permit pupils to attend segregated private schools.

The pupil placement plan has been condemned in the circuit court in a decision that said it was not compatible with the "deliberate speed" concept and that "it is not a plan for desegregation at all." At the time of writing of the report the Supreme Court had still to affirm or reject this ruling.

The high court, however, already has ruled unanimously that two representative pupil transfer plans are unconstitutional.

IN LATER sections of the report, Morland discusses the racial and social fallacies on which resistance to segregation is based. These include the idea, universally rejected by scientists that capacity to learn has any direct connection with race and that school integration will result in lower educational standards and heightened social tensions.

He dismisses the argument of racial inequality with the statement that "Americans can be treated as individuals rather than as members of races and they can be given equal opportunity as individuals to develop their abilities without fear of any consequences known to science."

He quotes those in the forefront of the integration movement—notably in Louisville and Baltimore—to show that desegregation of schools has improved educational standards and coincided with, if not actually caused, a decline in juvenile delinquency.

This effect, he argues, might be even more marked if the millions spent by the resistant states on legislation and litigation to block integration were to be devoted to educational purposes.

MEMPHIS, TENN.
COMMERCIAL APPEAL
D. 216,858 S. 260,847

JUL 14 1963

Dixie School Integration Is 'Token'

From Our Press Services

Fewer than one in 100 Negro pupils in 11 Southern and border states is attending desegregated schools, a study showed yesterday.

The study, "Token Integration and Beyond," was published by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith and the Southern Regional Council, a non-profit, non-political, bi-racial research and educational organization.

A professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College in Lynchburg, Va., J. Kenneth Morland, summarized the findings.

In other racial news, Birmingham Mayor Albert Boutwell announced the formation of a city Community Affairs Committee with members "from all walks of life." The committee, which apparently will be bi-racial, will "inform, advise and recommend to the mayor and the council . . . what steps may be taken toward the development, improvement and general growth of the Birmingham area."

Establishment of such a committee was one of the conditions Negro leaders set forth in their recent massive desegregation campaign at Birmingham.

At Albany, Ga., Robert J. Kelley of Baltimore, a 19-year-old Marine who told police he had been brooding over recent racial unrest, was charged with wounding a Negro railroad flagman, Jessie Bailey. Bailey received pellet wounds in the back, but was not seriously hurt.

In Humboldt, Tenn., Mayor Dan Scott gave further details of a Negro demonstration which resulted in the arrest Friday of about 35 Negroes.

The Negroes moved into the municipal park and took over the playground area. A group of whites gathered and threats were made and police asked the Negroes to leave for "their own protection." When the Negroes refused, they were arrested on charges of threatening a breach of the peace and disorderly conduct.

Rev. J. T. Freeman, president of the Humboldt-Gibson County branch of the NAACP, said he and 39 others were arrested. Three juveniles among those arrested were released to await hearing in juvenile court, he said, and the others were taken to the Gibson County Jail and released late yesterday under $250 bond each pending trial in City Court at Humboldt July 27.

In New York, eight Congress of Racial Equality members left a picket line of about 100 persons outside a Bronx restaurant and launched a sit-in at the diner, scene of weeklong demonstrations and sporadic violence. They filled all available seats inside.

A police detachment, from among the hundreds of police in the area guarding against a renewal of violence, also was inside. There were no customers.

Meanwhile, in Harlem, Black Muslim leader Malcolm X told a rally of the Negro supremacy group that the Federal Government will provoke a civil war among whites "by trying to force them to give up their jobs to Negroes."

In Atlanta, white demonstrators picketed a desegregated restaurant, while Negroes and a few whites picketed one which serves only white persons.

In St. Louis, Negro pickets protesting alleged discriminatory policies of two amusement parks said they will continue their demonstrations until the parks change their policies.

At Danville, Va., small picketing by Negroes kept harried police on the run and by early evening 14 of the pickets had been jailed. The arrests stemmed from picketing in two downtown department stores.

In Peoria, Ill., 100 Negro and white demonstrators who have been protesting alleged discrimination in hiring practices of Central Illinois Light Co. visited its headquarters. They milled around the showroom, handling merchandise on display and making complaints about the lack of sales personnel on duty.

In Detroit, 60 Negroes and 15 whites peacefully picketed 18 apartment houses in protest of alleged housing discrimination.

ATLANTA, GA.
JOURNAL-CONSTITUTION
SUN. 504,755

JUL 14 1963

'Token' Plans Seen Aiding Racial Bias

By FRED POWLEDGE

Legislative attempts in 11 Southern states to forestall large-scale desegregation through "pupil placement plans" have apparently achieved their purpose, a study showed Saturday.

The report, called "Token Desegregation and Beyond," shows that only four-tenths of 1 per cent of the Negro pupils in the "resistant" states were actually attending school with whites as of November 1962.

In six other states, designated as "compliant" with federal desegregation orders, 51.1 per cent of the Negro pupils are in school with whites.

THE REPORT is by J. Kenneth Morland, professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College in Lynchburg, Va. It is published jointly by the Southern Regional Council of Atlanta and the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith.

Prof. Morland concludes that desegregation nine years after the 1954 Supreme Court decision is "exceedingly limited" in those states which may be described as "resistant" to desegregation. He names these states as Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North and South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia.

STATES WHICH have "moved more or less steadily toward compliance" were named as Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia.

Prof. Morland found that 11.8 per cent of the school districts which contain both white and Negro children in the resistant states had desegregated — and points out that desegregation is officially accomplished when one Negro attends a school formerly attended only by whites. In the compliant states, 90.6 per cent of the biracial districts are desegregated.

In the desegregated districts, he found that 2 per cent of the Negroes were attending schools with whites in the resistant states, 54.8 per cent in the compliant states.

AND IN A TABLE showing the number and percentage of Negro pupils in all public school districts with whites, Prof. Morland shows the actual rate of integration.

In the resistant states, 12,217 Negroes of a total of 2,803,882 attend school with whites, for a percentage of 0.4. In the complint states, 243,150 Negroes of a total of 475,549 attend with whites, for a percentage of 51.1.

Once the resistant and compliant states are lumped together, the percentage of Negroes attending schools with whites comes to 7.8.

"DESEGREGATION as a reality," says the report, "still lies in

Prof. Morland found that 11.8 per cent of the school districts which contain both white and Negro children in the resistant states had desegregated — and points out that desegregation is officially accomplished when one Negro attends a school formerly attended only by whites. In the compliant states, 90.6 per cent of the biracial districts are desegregated.

In the desegregated districts, he found that 2 per cent of the Negroes were attending schools with whites in the resistant states, 54.8 per cent in the compliant states.

AND IN A TABLE showing the number and percentage of Negro pupils in all public school districts with whites, Prof. Morland shows the actual rate of integration.

In the resistant states, 12,217 Negroes of a total of 2,803,882 attend school with whites, for a percentage of 0.4. In the complint states, 243,150 Negroes of a total of 475,549 attend with whites, for a percentage of 51.1.

Once the resistant and compliant states are lumped together, the percentage of Negroes attending schools with whites comes to 7.8.

"DESEGREGATION as a reality," says the report, "still lies in the future, for it is to be remembered that 99 per cent of the Negro children in the 11 former Confederate states continue to be in all-Negro schools.

"Just how soon desegregated, non-racial school systems will develop throughout the South depends on several factors. These include the determination of Negro plaintiffs to press for equal treatment, the vigor of the federal government in demanding the elimination of discrimination, and the willingness of school boards and communities to act in good faith in compliance with the Supreme Court decision."

PROFESSOR MORELAND writes that if the resistant states "continue to try to maintain de facto racial segregation in their public schools, they can be assured of two things: It will be futile in the long run, and it will be costly."

He estimates that the expense of legal litigation contesting desegregation until November 1962 could amount to $4,395,000. Five extraordinary sessions of the Louisiana Legislature have cost $934,000, and thousands of dollars have been spent in tuition grant funds, many of them to students who were attending private schools anyway.

MACON GA.
TELEGRAPH AND NEWS
SUN. 64,510

JUL 14 1963

Few Negroes in South in Mixed Classes

ATLANTA, Ga. [AP] — Fewer than one in 200 Negro pupils in 11 Southern states are attending desegregated schools, a study showed today.

The study, "Token Integration and Beyond," was published by the Anti-Defamation league of B'rith and the Southern Regional Council, a nonprofit, nonpolitical, biracial research and educational organization.

A professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College in Lynchburg, Va., J. Kenneth Morland, summarized the findings.

He said continued segregation was a result of "fear of integration itself" and "subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive" of 1954 which ruled public school segregation unconstitutional.

The study, based on compilations in November 1962, showed that Alabama, Mississippi and South Carolina had no integration at all in public primary and secondary schools.

Morland's findings dealt with Southern and border states school districts. They showed that 31.8 per cent of biracial districts have been desegregated in the area.

An over-all percentage of 90.6 was listed for Delaware, District of Columbia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia.

In the 11 other states, which Morland labeled "resistant" toward desegregation, 11.8 per cent of the districts have been desegregated.

States in which all school districts have been desegregated were listed as Delaware, Maryland and West Virginia, plus the District of Columbia.

In the "resistant" states, .4 per cent of the Negro pupils were in desegregated schools. In the other "compliant" states, Morland said, the percentage was 51.1.

He said that state legislatures have passed at least 379 laws since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling.

"A basic method for keeping desegregation in public schools at token levels has been through the adoption of pupil placement laws," he said.

In actual operation, Morland contended, these laws "have been used with the assumption that initial assignments could be by race. Negroes have been assigned to all-Negro schools and whites to all-white schools, even though ostensibly on criteria other than race."

The professor added:

"In practice, the children who have applied for transfers from schools to which members of their race have been assigned have almost always been Negroes. Thus actual integration of schools has depended upon whether Negro parents and their children were willing to go through time-consuming, expensive steps to contest the initial assignment."

A second anti-ingegration method, he said, has been "local option" provisions which allow communities to close schools ordered to desegregate.

"Another device for avoiding integrated schools has been the offer of tuition grants to allow pupils to attend private, nonsectarian schools instead of public schools," Morland said. "Six states — Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, North Carolina and Virginia — have passed such legislation."

He said:

"Still another way of keeping integration at low levels has been the grade-a-year or stair-step plan."

Morland said that if communities "continue to try to maintain de facto racial segregation in their public schools, they can be assured of two things. It will be futile in the long run, and it will be costly."

He said the federal courts have become "less and less patient" with token integration plans and have "blunted and eliminated" many such plans.

"Federal courts," he concluded, "are not going to permit the continuation of racial schools, and states may well be faced with either closing all of their public schools or extending integration beyond token levels."

End adv for ams Sun July 14

PAGE (s) MISSING

DULUTH, MINN.
NEWS TRIBUNE
D. 54,039 S. 78,586

JUL 14 1963

Desegregation Limps in South

ATLANTA, Ga. (AP) — Fewer than one in 100 Negro pupils in 11 Southern states are attending desegregated schools, a study showed today.

The study, "Token Integration and Beyond," was published by the Anti-Defamation league of B'rith and the Southern Regional Council, a nonprofit, nonpolitical, biracial research and educational organization.

A professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College in Lynchburg, Va., J. Kenneth Morland, summarized the findings.

He said continued segregation was a result of "fear of integration itself" and "subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive" of 1954 which ruled public school segregation unconstitutional.

The study, based on compilations in November 1962, showed that Alabama, Mississippi and South Carolina had no integration at all in public primary and secondary schools.

Moreland's findings dealt with Southern and border states school districts. They showed that 31.8 per cent of biracial districts have been desegregated in the area.

An over-all percentage of 90.6 was listed for Delaware, District of Columbia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia.

In the 11 other states, which Morland labeled "resistant" toward desegregation, 11.8 per cent of the districts have been desegregated.

States in which all school districts have been desegregated were listed as Delaware, Maryland and West Virginia, plus the District of Columbia.

In the "resistant" states, .4 per cent of the Negro pupils were in desegregated schools. In the other "compliant" states, Morland said, the percentage was 51.1.

He said that state legislatures have passed at least 379 laws since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling.

"A basic method for keeping desegregation in public schools at token levels has been through the adoption of pupil placement laws," he said.

In actual operation, Morland contended, these laws "have been used with the assumption that initial assignments could be by race. Negroes have been assigned to all-Negro schools and whites to all-white schools, even though ostensibly on criteria other than race."

The professor added:

"In practice, the children who have applied for transfers from schools to which members of their race have ben assigned have almost always ben Negroes. Thus actual integration of schools has depended upon whether Negro parents and their children were willing to go through time-method, he said, has been "local option" provisions which allow communities to close schools ordered to desegregate.

'Another device for avoiding integrated schools has been the offer of tuition grants to allow pupils to attend private, nonsectarian schools instead of public schools," Morland said. "Six states — Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, North Carolina and Virginia — have passed such legislation."

He said:

"Still another way of keeping integration at low levels has ben the grade-a-year or stair-step plan."

Morland said that if communities "continue to try to maintain de facto racial segregation in their public schools, they can be assured of two things. It will be futile in the long run, and it will be costly."

He said the federal courts have become "less and less patient" with token integration plans and have "blunted and eliminated" many such plans.

"Federal courts," he concluded, 'are not going to permit the continuation of racial schools, and states may well be faced with either closing all of their public schools or extending integration beyond token levels."

RALEIGH, N.C.
NEWS & OBSERVER
D. 128,829 S: 141,373

JUL 14 1963

11 Deep-South States Have Only 1% School Integration

ATLANTA, Ga. (AP) — Fewer than one in 100 Negro pupils in 11 Southern states are attending desegregated schools, a study showed today.

The study, "Token Integration and Beyond," was published by the Anti-Defamation league of B'rith and the Southern Regional Council, a nonprofit, nonpolitical, biracial research and educational organization.

A professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College in Lynchburg, Va., J. Kenneth Morland, summarized the findings.

He said continued segregation was a result of "fear of integration itself" and "subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive" of 1954 which ruled public school segregation unconstitutional.

None At All.

The study, based on compilations in November 1962, showed that Alabama, Mississippi and South Carolina had no integration at all in public primary and secondary schools.

Morland's findings dealt with Southern and border states school districts. They showed that 31.8 per cent of biracial districts have been desegregated in the area.

An over-all percentage of 90.6 was listed for Delaware, District of Columbia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia.

In the 11 other states, which Morland labeled "resistant" toward desegregation, 11.8 per cent of the districts have been desegregated.

States in which all school districts have been desegregated were listed as Delaware, Maryland and West Virginia, plus the District of Columbia.

In the "resistant" states, .4 per cent of the Negro pupils were in desegregated schools. In the other "compliant" states, Morland said, the percentage was 51.1.

He said that state legislatures have passed at least 379 laws since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling.

"A basic method for keeping desegregation in public schools at token levels has been through the adoption of pupil placement laws," he said.

In actual operation, Morland contended, these laws "have been used with the assumption that initial assignments could be by race. Negroes have been assigned to all-Negro schools and whites to all-white schools, even though sotensibly on criteria other than race."

The professor added:

"In practice, the children who have applied for transfers from schools to which members of their race have been assigned have almost always been Negroes. Thus actual integration of schools has depended upon whether Negro parents and their children were willing to go through time-consuming, expensive steps to contest the initial assignment."

A second anti-ingegration method, he said, has been "local option" provisions which allow communities to close schools ordered to desegregate.

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
D. 55,233 S. 93,957

JUL 14 1963

Few Southern Negroes Now Attend Integrated Schools

By HOYT HARWELL

ATLANTA, Ga. (AP) — Fewer than one in 100 Negro pupils in 11 Southern states are attending desegregated schools, a study showed today.

The study, "Token Integration and Beyond," was published by the Anti-Defamation league of B'rith and the Southern Regional Council, a nonprofit, nonpolitical, biracial research and educational organization.

A professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College in Lynchburg, Va., J. Kenneth Morland, summarized the findings.

He said continued segregation was a result of "fear of integration itself" and "subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive" of 1954 which ruled public school segregation unconstitutional.

The study, based on compilations in November 1962, showed that Alabama, Mississippi and South Carolina had no integration at all in public primary and secondary schools.

Morland's findings dealt with Southern and border states school districts. They showed that 31.8 per cent of biracial districts have been desegregated in the area.

An over-all percentage of 90.6 was listed for Delaware, District of Columbia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia.

In the 11 other states, which Morland labeled "resistant" toward desegregation, 11.8 per cent of the districts have been desegregated.

States in which all school districts have been desegregated were listed as Delaware, Maryland and West Virginia, plus the District of Columbia.

In the "resistant" states, .4 per cent of the Negro pupils were in desegregated schools. In the other "compliant" states, Morland said, the percentage was 51.1.

He said that state legislatures have passed at least 379 laws since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling.

"A basic method for keeping desegregation in public schools at token levels has been through the adoption of pupil placement laws," he said.

In actual operation, Morland contended, these laws "have been used with the assumption that initial assignments could be by race. Negroes have been assigned to all-Negro schools and whites to all-white schools, even though ostensibly on criteria other than race."

"In practice, the children who have applied for transfers from schools to which members of their race have been assigned have almost always been Negroes. Thus actual integration of schools has depended upon whether Negro parents and their children were willing to go through time-consuming, expensive steps to contest the initial assignment."

A second anti-ingegration method, he said, has been "local option" provisions which allow communities to close schools ordered to desegregate.

"Another device for avoiding integrated schools has been the offer of tuition grants to allow pupils to attend private, nonsectarian schools instead of public schools," Morland said. "Six states — Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, North Carolina and Virginia — have passed such legislation."

VALLEJO, CALIF.
TIMES-HERALD
D. 26,055 S. 26,046

JUL 14 1963

NEGROES IN SCHOOL

Integration Affects Only One In 100

By HOYT HARWELL

ATLANTA, Ga. (AP) — Fewer than one in 100 Negro pupils in 11 Southern states are attending desegregated schools, a study showed yesterday.

The study, "Token Integration and Beyond," was published by the Anti-Defamation league of B'rith and the Southern Regional Council, a nonprofit, nonpolitical, biracial research and educational organization.

A professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College in Lynchburg, Va., J. Kenneth Morland, summarized the findings.

He said continued segregation was a result of "fear of integration itself" and "subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive" of 1954 which ruled public school segregation unconstitutional.

STUDY BASIS

The study, based on compilations in November 1962, showed that Alabama, Mississippi and South Carolina had no integration at all in public primary and secondary schools.

Moreland's findings dealt with Southern and border states school districts. They showed that 31.8 per cent of biracial districts have been desegregated in the area.

An over-all percentage of 90.6 was listed for Delaware, District of Columbia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia.

In the 11 other states, which Morland labeled "resistant" toward desegregation, 11.8 per cent of the districts have been desegregated.

States in which all school districts have been desegregated were listed as Delaware, Maryland and West Virginia, plus the District of Columbia.

In the "resistant" states, .4 per cent of the Negro pupils were in desegregated schools. In the other "compliant" states, Morland said, the percentage was 51.1.

He said that state legislatures have passed at least 379 laws since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling.

"A basic method for keeping desegregation in public schools at token levels has been through the adoption of pupil placement laws," he said.

In actual operation, Morland contended, these laws "have been used with the assumption that initial assignments could be by race. Negroes have been assigned to all-Negro schools and whites to all-white schools, even though ostensibly on criteria other than race."

"In practice, the children who have applied for transfers from schools to which members of their race have been assigned have almost always been Negroes. Thus actual integration of schools has depended upon whether Negro parents and their children were willing to go through time-consuming, expensive steps to contest the initial assignment."

A second anti-ingegration method, he said, has been "local option" provisions which allow communities to close schools ordered to desegregate.

"Another device for avoiding integrated schools has been the offer of tuition grants to allow pupils to attend private, nonsectarian schools instead of public schools," Morland said. "Six states — Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, North Carolina and Virginia — have passed such legislation."

He said:

"Still another way of keeping integration at low levels has been the grade-a-year or stair-step plan."

Morland said that if communities "continue to try to maintain de facto racial segregation in their public schools, they can be assured of two things. It will be futile in the long run, and it will be costly."

He said the federal courts have become "less and less patient" with token integration plans and have "blunted and eliminated" many such plans.

"Federal courts," he concluded, "are not going to permit the continuation of racial schools, and states may well be faced with either closing all of their public schools or extending integration beyond token levels."

Moreland's findings dealt with Southern and border states school districts. They showed that 31.8 per cent of biracial districts have been desegregated in the area.

An over-all percentage of 90.6 was listed for Delaware, District of Columbia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia.

In the 11 other states, which Morland labeled "resistant" toward desegregation, 11.8 per cent of the districts have been desegregated.

States in which all school districts have been desegregated were listed as Delaware, Maryland and West Virginia, plus the District of Columbia.

In the "resistant" states, .4 per cent of the Negro pupils were in desegregated schools. In the other "compliant" states, Morland said, the percentage was 51.1.

He said that state legislatures have passed at least 379 laws since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling.

"A basic method for keeping desegregation in public schools at token levels has been through the adoption of pupil placement laws," he said.

In actual operation, Morland contended, these laws "have been used with the assumption that initial assignmen's could be by race. Negroes have been assigned to all-Negro schools and whites to all-white schools, even though ostensibly on criteria other than race."

The professor added:

PRACTICE TOLD

"In practice, the children who have applied for transfers from schools to which members of their race have been assigned have almost alway been Negroes. Thus actual integration of schools has depended upon whether Negro parents and their children were willing to go through time-consuming, expensive steps to contest the initial assignment."

A second anti-ingegration method, he said, has been "local option" provisions which allow communities to close schools ordered to desegregate.

"Another device for avoiding integrated schools has been the offer of tuition grants to allow pupils to attend private, nonsectarian schools instead of public schools," Morland said. "Six states — Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, North Caro-

Arkansas Gazette.
LITTLE ROCK, ARK.
D. 92,176 S. 105,024

JUL 14 1963

State Is Listed Among 11 Resisting Integration

Atlanta, July 13 (UPI).—A new report on the progress of school desegregation said today that fewer than one out of 200 Negro children in 11 Southern states are now in integrated classes.

The report, published by the Southern Regional Council and the Anti-defamation League of B'nai B'rith, was prepared by J. Kenneth Morland, professor of sociology at Randolph - Macon Woman's College at Lynchburg, Va.

The report said the 11 "resistant" states had adopted token integration plans designed "to meet the demands of the Supreme Court by allowing some integration while still keeping the number of Negroes in school with whites at such a low level as to maintain de facto (in fact) segregation."

Morland listed pupil placement laws, local option provisions with their school closing authorizations, tuition grants and restrictive transfer plans as the main programs that have kept 99.6 per cent of the Negroes in schools of the 11 states in segregated classes.

Morland singled out as the "resistant" states Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisina, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

Previously segregated areas that have "complied" with the 1954 Supreme Court school desegregation decision were listed as Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma, West Virginia and the District of Columbia.

Morland pointed out that overall school desegregation statistics failed to show the slow pace in the Deep South and in some cases hid the facts inside the South.

He noted that statistics showed Nashville, Tenn., with 810 Negroes in schools with whites but that actually 540 of them were in a school with a single white child and a Chinese-American.

Of the 270 desegregated districts in the "resistant" states last fall, 176 were in Texas alone, he said.

"Racial integration in public schools is by any standard at token levels in resistant states, where 98 per cent of the Negro pupils in desegregated districts and 99.6 per cent in all school districts are in segregated schools," Morland concluded.

The federal courts "are not going to permit the continuation of racial schools," Morland emphasized. He said de facto segregation would be "futile in the long run" and very costly.

On the basis of a Civil Rights Commission estimate that one racial case costs $15,000, Morland estimated that letigation over the issue already had cost $4,395,000. There have been 223 cases in "resistant" states and 70 in the others.

He estimated the cost of extraordinary legislative sessions on the race question at $934,000 $7,750,000 for 38,000 tuition grants to children who refused to attend integrated schools and the "less tangible" cost of "handicapping school administrators in improving the quality of education in the public schools."

"Another cost of token integration is the keeping of the race issue alive, the catering to racial prejudice and the giving of false hope to segregationists," Morland wrote.

He said that fear of social troubles and lowering of academic standards governed much of the reluctance to move into integrated programs.

"It has been demonstrated repeatedly that when state and local officials act in resolute firmness there has not been violence or serious opposition in carrying out the mandate of the courts," Morland said.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
D. 97,672 S. 105,605

JUL 14 1963

Sucess Rate Less Than 1 Per Cent

School Integration Still Nil In South

ATLANTA (UPI) — A new report on the progress of school desegregation said Saturday that fewer than one out of 200 Negro children in 11 Southern states are now in integrated classes.

The report, published by Southern Regional Council and the Anti-Defamation League, was prepared by J. Kenneth Morland, professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon woman's college, Lynchburg, Va.

The report said the 11 "resistant" states had adopted token integration plans designed "to meet the demands of the Supreme court by allowing some integration while still keeping the number of Negroes in school with whites at such a low level as to maintain de facto (in fact) segregation."

Morland listed pupil placement laws, local option provisions with their school closing authorizations, tuition grants and restrictive transfer plans as the main programs that have kept 99.6 per cent of the Negroes in schools of the 11 states in segregated classes.

Morland pointed out that overall school desegregation statistics fail to show the slow pace in the deep South and in some cases hide the facts inside the South.

He noted that statistics show Nashville, Tenn., with 810 Negroes in schools with whites, but that actually 540 of them were in a school with a single white child and a Chinese-American.

Of the 270 desegregated districts in the "resistant" states last fall, 176 were in Texas alone, he said.

"Racial integration in public schools is by any standard at token levels in resistant states, where 98 per cent of the Negro pupils in desegregated districts and 99.6 per cent in all school districts are in segregated schools," Morland concluded.

Segregation Futile

The federal courts "are not going to permit the continuation of racial schools," Morland emphasized. He said de facto segregation would be "futile in the long run" and very costly.

He said that fear of social troubles and lowering of academic standards governed much of the reluctance to move into integrated programs.

WASHINGTON, D.C.
STAR
D. 258,167 S. 313,112

JUL 14 1963

South Holds Race Line Firmly, Study Finds

ATLANTA, July 13 (AP).—Fewer than one in 200 Negro pupils in 11 Southern States are attending desegreated schools, a study showed today.

The study, "Token Integration and Beyond," was published by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith and the Southern Regional Council, a non-profit, non-political, biracial research and educational organization.

A professor of sociology at Randolph - Macon Woman's College in Lynchburg, Va., J. Kenneth Morland, summarized the findings.

The study, based on compilations in November, 1962, showed that Alabama, Mississippi and South Carolina had no integration at all in public primary and secondary schools.

Mr. Morland's finding dealt with southern and border States school districts. They showed that 31.8 per cent of biracial districts have been desegregated in the area.

Higher in Border Area

An over-all percentage of 90.6 was listed for Delaware, District of Columbia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virgina.

In the 11 other States, which Mr. Morland labeled "resistant" toward desegregation, 11.8 per cent of the districts have been desegregated.

States in which all school districts have been desegregated were listed as Delaware, Maryland and West Virginia, plus the District of Columbia.

In the "resistant" States, .4 per cent of the Negro pupils were in desegregated schools. In the other "compliant" States, Mr. Morland said, the percentage was 51.1.

He said that State legislatures have passed at least 379 laws since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling.

Placement a Weapon

"A basic method for keeping desegregation in public schools at token levels has been through the adoption of pupil placement laws," he said.

In actual operation, Mr. Morland contended, these laws "have been used with the assumption that initial assignments could be by race. Negroes have been assigned to all-Negro schools and whites to all-white schools, even though ostensibly on criteria other than race."

"Federal courts," Mr. Morland concluded, "are not going to permit the continuation of racial schools, and States may well be faced with either closing all of their public schools or extending integration beyond token levels."

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
NEWS
D. 187,020 S. 220,313

JUL 14 1963

School integration in South still slow

BY HOYT HARWELL

ATLANTA, July 13 —(AP)— Fewer than one in 100 Negro pupils in 11 Southern states are attending desegregated schools, a study showed today.

The study, "Token Integration and Beyond," was published by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith and the Southern Regional Council, a non-profit, non-political, biracial research and educational organization.

A professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College in Lynchburg, Va., J. Kenneth Morland, summarized the findings.

He said continued segregation was a result of "fear of integration itself" and "subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court Directive" of 1954 which ruled public school segregation unconstitutional.

The study, based on compilations in November 1962, showed that Alabama, Mississippi and South Carolina had no integration at all in public primary and secondary schools.

MORLAND'S FINDINGS dealt with Southern and border states' school districts. They showed that 31.8 per cent of biracial districts have been desegregated in the area.

An over-all percentage of 90.6 was listed for Delaware, District of Columbia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia.

In the 11 other states, which Morland labeled "resistant" toward desegregation, 11.8 per cent of the districts have been desegregated.

States in which all school districts have been desegregated were listed as Delaware, Maryland and West Virginia, plus the District of Columbia.

In the "resistant" states, .4 per cent of the Negro pupils were in desegregated schools. In the other "compliant" states, Morland said, the percentage was 51.1.

Flood of laws passed

HE SAID STATE legislatures have passed at least 379 laws since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling.

"A basic method for keeping desegregation in public schools at token levels has been through the adoption of pupil placement laws," he said.

Turn to Page 18, Column 1

School integration in South still slow

Continued from Page 15

In actual operation, Morland contended, the laws "have been used with the assumption that initial assignments could be by race. Negroes have been assigned to all-Negro schools and whites to all-white schools, even though ostensibly on criteria other than race."

The professor added:

"In practice, the children who have applied for transfers from schools to which members of their race have been assigned have almost always been Negroes. Thus actual integration of schools has depended upon whether Negro parents and their children were willing to go through time-consuming, expensive steps to contest the initial assignment."

'Local option' measures

A SECOND anti-integration method, he said, has been "local option" provisions which allow communities to close schools ordered to desegregate.

"Another device for avoiding integrated schools has been the offer of tuition grants to allow pupils to attend private, nonsectarian schools instead of public schools," Morland said. "Six states—Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, North Carolina and Virginia — have passed such legislation".

He said:

"Still another way of keeping integration at low levels has been the grade-a-year or stair-step plan."

Morland said that if communities "continue to try to maintain de facto racial segregation in their public schools, they can be assured of two things. It will be futile in the long run, and it will be costly."

HE SAID THE federal courts have become "less and less patient" with token integration plans and have "blunted and eliminated" many such plans.

"Federal courts," he concluded, "are not going to permit the continuation of racial schools, and states may well be faced with either closing all of their public schools or extending integration beyond token levels."

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
TRIBUNE
D. 218,345 S. 654,561

JUL 14 1963

Integration Under 1% in Southern Schools

ATLANTA, Ga. — (AP) — Fewer than one in 200 Negro pupils in 11 southern states are attending desegregated schools, a study showed Saturday.

The study, "Token Integration and Beyond," was published by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith and the Southern Regional Council, a nonprofit, nonpolitical, biracial research and educational organization.

A professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College in Lynchburg, Va., J. Kenneth Morland, summarized the findings.

HE SAID continued segregation was a result of "fear of integration itself" and "subterfuge in complying with the supreme court directive" of 1954 which ruled public school segregation unconstitutional.

The study, based on compilations in November 1962, showed that Alabama, Mississippi and South Carolina had no integration at all in public primary and secondary schools.

Morland's findings dealt with southern and border states school districts. They showed that 31.8 per cent of biracial districts have been desegregated in the area.

AN OVER-ALL percentage of 90.6 was listed for Delaware, District of Columbia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia.

In the 11 other states, which Morland labeled "resistant" toward desegregation, 11.8 per cent of the districts have been desegregated.

States in which all school districts have been desegregated were listed as Delaware, Maryland and West Virginia, plus the District of Columbia.

In the "resistant" states, .4 per cent of the Negro pupils were in desegregated schools. In the other "compliant" states, Morland said, the percentage was 51.1.

State legislatures have passed at least 379 laws since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling.

"A basic method for keeping desegregation in public schools at token levels has been through the adoption of pupil placement laws," he said.

In actual operation, Morland contended, these laws "have been used with the assumption that initial assignments could be by race. Negroes have been assigned to all-Negro schools and whites to all-white schools, even though ostensibly on criteria other than race."

A second anti-integration method, he said, has been "local option" provisions which allow communities to close schools ordered to desegregate.

"Another device for avoiding integrated schools has been the offer of tuition grants to allow pupils to attend private, nonsectarian schools instead of public schools," Morland said. "Six states — Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, North Carolina and Virginia — have passed such legislation."

He said:

"STILL ANOTHER way of keeping integration at low levels has been the grade-a-year or stair-step plan."

Morland said that if communities "continue to try to maintain de facto racial segregation in their public schools, they can be assured of two things. It will be futile in the long run, and it will be costly."

Chicago Tribune
THE WORLD'S GREATEST NEWSPAPER
D. 854,085 S. 1,157,232
JUL 14 1963

Report Finds Uneven Desegregation Trend

Atlanta, July 13 (AP) — Fewer than 1 in 100 Negro pupils in 11 southern states are attending desegregated schools, a study showed today.

The study, "Token Integration and Beyond," was published by the Anti-Defamation league of B'nai B'rith and the Southern Regional council, a nonprofit, nonpolitical, bi-racial research and educational organization.

A professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon woman's college in Lynchburg, Va., J. Kenneth Morland, summarized the findings.

"Fear of Integration"

He said continued segregation was a result of "fear of integration itself" and "subterfuge in complying with the Supreme court directive" of 1954 which ruled public school segregation unconstitutional.

The study, based on compilations in November, 1962, showed that Alabama, Mississippi, and South Carolina had no integration at all in public primary and secondary schools.

Morland's findings dealt with southern and border states school districts. They showed that 31.8 per cent of bi-racial districts have been desegregated in the area.

Cites Certain States

An over-all percentage of 90.6 was listed for Delaware, District of Columbia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma, and West Virginia. In the 11 other states, which Morland labeled "resistant" toward desegregation, 11.8 per cent of the districts have been desegregated.

States in which all school districts have been desegregated were listed as Delaware, Maryland, and West Virginia, and the District of Columbia.

In the "resistant" states, .4 per cent of the Negro pupils were in desegregated schools. In the other "compliant" states, Morland said, the percentage was 51.1.

He said that state legislatures have passed at least 379 laws since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme court ruling.

ATLANTA, GA.
WORLD
D. 29,800
PAGE ONE CERTIFIED
JUL 14 1963

Token Desegregation

Few Negroes In Desegregated Schools Nine Years After Ruling

Although it is nine years since the Supreme Court decided that segregation in the public schools is unconstitutional, less than half of one per cent of Negro pupils in eleven "resistant" states in the South are now attending desegregated schools, according to a study, "Token Desegregation and Beyond," published Saturday.

The study was prepared by J. Kenneth Morland, professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon woman's College Lynchburg, Virginia, and published by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith and the Southern Regional Council.

The study is the first of several publications planned by ADL and SRC on problems of desegregation. A second study, to be released within the next month, is a psychiatric analysis of the effect of school desegregation in the South, by Dr. Robert M. Coles.

The fact that 99.6 per cent of Negroes in all the school districts of the eleven states are still attending all-Negro schools was attributed to "fear of integration itself" and "subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive." The eleven states are Alabama, Arkansas Florida, Georgia Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia.

379 LAWS PASSED

Professor Morland said at least 379 laws have been passed by state legislatures since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling. He described the following as typical methods of keeping school integration at token levels:

Pupil placement laws authorizing a state or local board to assign pupils individually to different schools. When an Negro child applies for admission to a white school, the Board of Education can turn him down, not on grounds of race, but on as many as 20 detailed considerations including transportation, health, etc.

Local Option" provisions which allow communities to close their public schools.

—Tuition grants enabling pupils to attend private, nonsectarian schools.

—Restrictive transfer arrangements in schools which comply with the Supreme Court decision by assigning pupils to the school nearest their homes, and then automatically grant white students transfers to the nearest school in which whites are a majority.

According to the Morland study, no precise cataloging of the costs involved in these "devices" can be made. However, estimates show that the price is high. for example, a total of 293 court cases have been filed in state and federal courts at an average cost of about $15 000 each; in Louisiana, tutition grants amounted to some $859,000 in four months and five "Exeraordinary Sessions" held by the state legislature to prevent desgregation programs cost $934,000; Virginia's tuition grants totaled more than seven million dollars in five years; Georgia's legislature was forced to amend its law after tuition grants reached $215,987 in one year.

In direct contrast to the efforts of the "resistant" states to circumvent desegregation are the results in six "compliant" states which have tended to go along with the Supreme Court decision. In these states—Delaware. Kentucky, Maryland. Missouri, Oklahoma, and West Virginia—51.1 per cent of Negro to non-racial schools with whites and changeovers from bi-racial to non-racial school systems have been made for the most part "creatively and successfully."

FEARS REFUTED

Although segregationists warned against "dire consequences" for the quality of education if changes were made, the study declared areas refute the fears. The general consensus was that integration had not lowered the academic achievement of either white or Negro students. In addition, school children had shown themselves able to solve problems of adjustment to integration after the initial confrontation was over.

(Continued on Page 4, Col. 6)

Few Negroes

(Continued from Page One)

Professor Morland listed these among the factors determining when desegration will become a reality:

—The vigor of the federal government "in demanding the elimination of discrimination." The federal courts, he went on to say, have become "less and less patient" with token integration devices and have "blunted and eliminated" many such plans.

—The speed with which pupil placement laws, initially accepted as constitutional on their face, are declared unconstitutional as practiced in some school systems.

—The extent to which school closing is challenged when other public schools in the state remain open, and restricted transfer provisions that result in resegregation are rejected.

Professor Morland warned that token integration has essentially the same goal as massive resistance because it seeks to preserve the established pattern of segregation. He added, however, that the effort "will be futile in the long run."

"Federal courts are not going to permit the continuation of racial schools, and states may well be faced with either closing all of their public schools or extending integration beyound token levels," he said.

Copies of the study are available from the national office of the Anti-Defamation League, 515 Madison Avenue, New York 22, New York, or from the Southern Regional Council, 5 Forsyth Street, N. W., Atlanta 3, Georgia.

Atl. J. & C. 7/14/63

'Token' Plans Seen Aiding Racial Bias

Educ. - Soy.

By FRED POWLEDGE

Legislative attempts in 11 Southern states to forestall large-scale desegregation through "pupil placement plans" have apparently achieved their purpose, a study showed Saturday.

The report, called "Token Desegregation and Beyond," shows that only four-tenths of 1 per cent of the Negro pupils in the "resistant" states were actually attending school with whites as of November 1962.

In six other states, designated as "compliant" with federal desegregation orders, 51.1 per cent of the Negro pupils are in school with whites.

THE REPORT is by J. Kenneth Morland, professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College in Lynchburg, Va. It is published jointly by the Southern Regional Council of Atlanta and the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith.

Prof. Morland concludes that desegregation nine years after the 1954 Supreme Court decision is "exceedingly limited" in those states which may be described as "resistant" to desegregation. He names these states as Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North and South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia.

STATES WHICH have "moved more or less steadily toward compliance" were named as Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia.

Prof. Morland found that 11.8 per cent of the school districts which contain both white and Negro children in the resistant states had desegregated — and points out that desegregation is officially accomplished when one Negro attends a school formerly attended only by whites. In the compliant states, 90.6 per cent of the biracial districts are desegregated.

and Virginia.

STATES WHICH have "moved more or less steadily toward compliance" were named as Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia.

Prof. Morland found that 11.8 per cent of the school districts which contain both white and Negro children in the resistant states had desegregated — and points out that desegregation is officially accomplished when one Negro attends a school formerly attended only by whites. In the compliant states, 90.6 per cent of the biracial districts are desegregated.

In the desegregated districts, he found that 2 per cent of the Negroes were attending schools with whites in the resistant states, 54.8 per cent in the compliant states.

AND IN A TABLE showing the number and percentage of Negro pupils in all public school districts with whites, Prof. Morland shows the actual rate of integration.

In the resistant states, 12,217 Negroes of a total of 2,803,882 attend school with whites, for a percentage of 0.4. In the complint states, 243,150 Negroes of a total of 475,549 attend with whites, for a percentage of 51.1.

Once the resistant and compliant states are lumped together, the percentage of Negroes attending schools with whites comes to 7.8.

"DESEGREGATION as a reality," says the report, "still lies in the future, for it is to be remembered that 99 per cent of the Negro children in the 11 former Confederate states continue to be in all-Negro schools.

"Just how soon desegregated, non-racial school systems will develop throughout the South depends on several factors. These include the determination of Negro plaintiffs to press for equal treatment, the vigor of the federal government in demanding the elimination of discrimination, and the willingness of school boards and communities to act in good faith in compliance with the Supreme Court decision."

PROFESSOR MORELAND writes that if the resistant states "continue to try to maintain de facto racial segregation in their public schools, they can be assured of two things: It will be futile in the long run, and it will be costly."

He estimates that the expense of legal litigation contesting desegregation until November 1962 could amount to $4,395,000. Five extraordinary sessions of the Louisiana Legislature have cost $934,000, and thousands of dollars have been spent in tuition grant funds, many of them to students who were attending private schools anyway.

LONG BEACH, CALIF.
INDEPENDENT-PRESS-TELEGRAM
SUN. 144,468
JUL 14 1963

Tiny Fraction of Negro Pupils Inte

By HOYT HARWELL

ATLANTA (AP) — Fewer than one in 100 Negro pupils in 11 Southern states attend desegregated schools, a study showed today.

The study, "Token Integration and Beyond," was published by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nail B'rith and the Southern Regional Council, a non-profit, non-political, biracial research and education organization.

A professor of sociology at Randolph - Macon Woman's College in Lynchburg, Va., J. Kenneth Morland, summarized the findings.

He said continued segregation was a result of "fear of integration itself" and "subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive" of 1954 which ruled public school segregation unconstitutional.

The study, based on compilations in November 1962, showed that Alabama, Mississippi and South Carolina had no integration at all in public primary and secondary schools.

* * * *

MORELAND'S FINDINGS dealt with Southern and border states school districts. They showed that 31.8 percent of biracial districts have been desegregated in the area.

An over-all percentage of 90.6 was listed for Delaware, District of Columbia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia.

In the 11 other states, which Morland labeled "resistant" toward desegregation, 11.8 percent of the districts have been desegregated.

States in which all school districts have been desegregated were listed as Delaware, Maryland and West Virginia, plus the District of Columbia.

In the "resistant" states, .4 percent of the Negro pupils were in desegregated schools.

In the other "complaint" states, Morland said, the percentage was 51.1.

* * * *

HE SAID THAT state legislatures have passed at least 379 laws since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling.

"A basic method for keeping desegregation in public ils Integrated

e other "complaint" Morland said, the per- e was 51.1.

* * * *

SAID THAT state legis- have passed at least ws since 1954 in at- to legally avoid com- with the Supreme ruling.

basic method for keep- esegregation in public schools at token levels has been through the adoption of pupil placement laws," he said.

In actual operation, Morland contended, these laws "have been used with the assumption that initial assignments could be by race. Negroes have been assigned to all-Negro schools and whites to all-white schools, even though ostensibly on criteria other than race."

The professor added:

"In practice, the children who have applied for transfers from schools to which members of their race have been assigned have almost always been Negroes. Thus actual integration of schools has depended upon whether Negro parents and their children were willing to go through time-consuming, expensive steps to contest the initial assignment."

A SECOND anti-integration method, he said, has been "local option" provisions which allow communities to close schools ordered to desegregate.

"Another device for avoiding integrated schools has been the offer of tuition grants to allow pupils to attend private, nonsectarian schools instead of public schools," Morland said. "Six states — Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, North Carolina and Virginia have passed such legislation."

He said:

"Still another way of keeping integration at low levels has been the grade-a-year or stair-step plan."

Morland said if communities "continue to try to maintain de facto racial segregation in their public schools, they can be assured of two things. It will be futile in the long run, and it will be costly."

4.88 each
Limited quantity

1.77
Limited quantity
Regular $2.49. Use to ap-

The News, Lynchburg. VA. 7/14/63

LYNCHBURG TEACHER

Morland Does Survey On School Integration

Ed. South

By HOYT HARWELL

ATLANTA, Ga. (AP) — Fewer than one in 100 Negro pupils in 11 Southern states are attending desegregated schools, a study showed today.

The study, "Token Integration and Beyond," was published by the Anti-Defamation league of B'rith and the Southern Regional Council, a nonprofit, nonpolitical, biracial research and educational organization.

A professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College in Lynchburg, Va., J. Kenneth Morland, summarized the findings.

(EDITOR'S NOTE—Morland has been a member of and a top official of the Virginia Council on Human Rights which recently established a separate organization to offer advice to businessmen who wanted to integrate their businesses.)

He said continued segregation was a result of "fear of integration itself" and "subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive" of 1954 which ruled public school segregation unconstitutional.

The study, based on compilations in November 1962, showed that Alabama, Mississippi and South Carolina had no integration at all in public primary and secondary schools.

Moreland Findings

Moreland's findings dealt with Southern and border states school districts. They showed that 31.8 per cent of biracial districts have been desegregated in the area.

An over-all percentage of 90.6 was listed for Delaware, District of Columbia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia.

In the 11 other states, which Morland labeled "resistant" toward desegregation, 11.8 per cent of the districts have been desegregated.

States in which all school districts have been desegregated were listed as Delaware, Maryland and West Virginia, plus the District of Columbia.

In the "resistant" states, .4 per cent of the Negro pupils were in desegregated schools. In the other "compliant" states, Morland said, the percentage was 51.1.

Laws Cited

He said that state legislatures have passed at least 379 laws since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling.

"A basic method for keeping desegregation in public schools at token levels has been through the adoption of pupil placement laws," he said.

In actual operation, Morland contended, these laws "have been used with the assumption that initial assignments could be by race. Negroes have been assigned to all-Negro schools and whites to all-white schools, even though ostensibly on criteria other than race."

The professor added:

"In practice, the children who have applied for transfers from schools to which members of their race have been assigned have almost always been Negroes. Thus actual integration of schools has depended upon whether Negro parents and their children were willing to go through time-consuming, expensive steps to contest the initial assignment."

A second anti-ingegration method, he said, has been "local option" provisions which allow communities to close schools ordered to desegregate.

"Another device for avoiding integrated schools has been the offer of tuition grants to allow pupils to attend private, nonsectarian schools instead of public schools," Morland said. "Six states — Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, North Carolina and Virginia — have passed such legislation."

He said:

"Still another way of keeping integration at low levels has been the grade-a-year or stair-step plan."

Morland said that if communities "continue to try to maintain de facto racial segregation in their public schools, they can be assured of two things. It will be futile in the long run, and it will be costly."

He said the federal courts have become "less and less patient" with token integration plans and have "blunted and eliminated" many such plans.

"Federal courts," he concluded, "are not going to permit the continuation of racial schools, and states may well be faced with either closing all of their public schools or extending integration beyond token levels."

Ed - South

163

THE NEW YORK TIMES, SUNDAY, JULY 14,

11 States Accused of Bad Faith For 'Token' School Integration

Sociologist Reports That Less Than 1% of All Negroes Attend Classes With Whites—Nominal Laws Assailed

Bad faith in the operation of integration plans in 11 Southern states, it has been asserted, has maintained racial segregation in public schools intact nine years after the Supreme Court outlawed it.

This is the conclusion of a new report, "Token Desegregation and Beyond," issued yesterday by the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta and the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith in New York.

However, the report said, recent Federal district court and High Court rulings now offer hope of bringing to an end the evasive tactics of the "resistant" states and to force the Deep South to speedier compliance.

The author of the report is J. Kenneth Morland, professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College, Lynchburg, Va.

Professor Morland reported that only four-tenths of the 1 per cent of all Negroes in the 11 "most recalcitrant" states were attending schools with white children by the end of the current term. The states involved, he said, are Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

92 of 100 Segregated

Even when adding the record of "compliant" states — Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia — and the District of Columbia, he said, nearly 92 of every 100 Negroes in the Southern and border states attended segregated classes.

In the 11 resistant states only 11.8 percent of the so-called biracial school districts had been even nominally desegregated, Professor Morland said. This "inadequate" performance, he continued, was even more apparent than real.

By contrast, 90.6 percent of the biracial districts in the the border states integrated their schools in November, 1962. Delaware, Maryland, West Virginia and the District of Columbia desegregated all their school districts.

Professor Morland described as "token integration" those measures that are designed to offer nominal and technical compliance with the Supreme Court ruling but actually maintain complete or almost complete segregation.

"Token integration operates on the basis of fear and subterfuge—fear of integration itself and subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive," he said.

"While difficult problems can arise as communities change a biracial school ssytem into a nonracial one," he continued, "compliant states have demonstrated that this change can be made creatively and successfully."

Recent rulings by United States circuit courts and the Supreme Court, Professor Morland noted, have begun to recognize these token measures as evasions of the law.

Among these are pupil-placement plans and restrictive transfer provisions. The former, he said, gives to school boards the right to assign pupils individually to specific schools, with no specific mention made of race among the criteria for selection.

In practice, the boards assign Negroes and whites alike to schools in which all or nearly all attendance is of the same race, he declared.

Transfers Limited to Race

Such laws, Professor Morland said, have provisions for appeal from such assignments, but these are so complex and costly to pursue that few petitioners have the energy or resources to carry litigation to a successful conclusion.

Restrictive transfer provisions, he reported, have been widely used to lessen or nullify the effect of the so-called "grade-a-year" desegregation plans adopted in some school districts.

Under theses plans, one grade is desegregated each year and children of both races are assigned to schools nearest their homes. However, by administrative decision, the professor said, white children assigned to predominantly Negro schools and Negroes attending schools with a white majority are freely granted transfers to schools of their own race. The transfer of Negroes to white schools or, in rare cases, that of whites to Negro schools are not permitted, he said.

He cited other evasions that have given local communities the option of closing down public schools ordered to desegregate. Tuition grants by states to permit pupils to attend segregated private schools were also noted.

When the report was written the Supreme Court had not yet ruled on the constitutionality of the pupil-placement provisions. It has ruled unanimously that two representative pupil transfer plans are unconstitutional.

"Ostensibly, the plans for keeping integration at token levels have been devised to try to satisfy the courts," Professor Morland said. "It is quite obvious now that they are not doing so, and that the courts are becoming less and less patient with the bad faith implicit in them."

It is essential that the attack on such evasions be pressed, he went on, by "the determination of Negro plaintiffs, the vigor of the Federal Government and the willingness of school boards and communities to act in good faith."

The professor also attacked what he termed the racial and social fallacies on which resistance to segregation is based. These include, he said, the idea, universally rejected by scientists, that capacity to learn has any direct connection with race and that school integration will result in lower educational standards and heightened social tensions.

He dismissed the argument of racial inequality, saying:

"Americans can be treated as individuals rather than as members of races and they can be given equal opportunity as individuals to develop their abilities without fear of any consequences known to science."

He said those in the forefront of the integration movement—notably in Louisville and Baltimore—have declared that desegregation of schools has improved educational standards and has coincided with, if not actually caused, a decline in juvenile delinquency.

MIDDLETOWN, N.Y.
TIMES HERALD RECORD
D. 26,298

JUL 15 1963

editorial

School segregation still dominates

The author of the report is J. Kenneth Morland, professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College, Lynchburg, Va.

Professor Morland reported that only four-tenths of the 1 per cent of all Negroes in the 11 "most recalcitrant" states were attending schools with white children by the end of the current term. The states involved he said, are Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

Even when adding the record of "compliant" states--Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia--and the District of Columbia, he said, nearly 92 of every 100 Negroes in the Southern and border states attended segregated classes.

In the 11 resistant states only 11.8 per cent of the so-called biracial school districts had been even nominally desegregated. Professor Morland said. This "inadequate" performance, he continued, was even more apparent than real.

By contrast, 90.6 per cent of the biracial districts in the border states integrated their schools in November, 1962. Delaware, Maryland, West Virginia, and the District of Columbia desegregated all their school districts.

Professor Morland described as "token integration" those measures that are designed to offer nominal and technical compliance with the Supreme Court ruling but actually maintain complete or almost complete segregation.

"Token integration operates on the basis of fear and subterfuge--fear of integration itself and subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive," he said.

* * *

As much as any other argument, Professor Morland's report disproves the contention that, given time, the South will voluntarily move toward granting equal rights to all its citizens.

Strong laws and unyielding exercise of those laws are required.

Bad faith in the operation of integration plans in 11 Southern states has maintained racial segregation in public schools intact nine years after the Supreme Court outlawed it.

This is the conclusion of a new report, "Token Desegregation and Beyond," issued by the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta and the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith in New York.

However, the report said, recent federal district court and High Court rulings now offer hope of bringing to an end the evasive tactics of the "resistant" states and to force the Deep South to speedier compliance.

BOSTON, MASS.
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE
MONITOR
EASTERN EDITION
D. 174,850
JUL 15 1963

Integration Study Examines Schools

By the Associated Press

Atlanta

Fewer than one in 100 Negro pupils in 11 Southern states are attending desegregated schools, according to a study recently released.

The study, "Token Integration and Beyond," was published by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith and the Southern Regional Council, a nonprofit, nonpolitical, biracial research and educational organization.

A professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College in Lynchburg, Va., J. Kenneth Morland, summarized the findings.

He said continued segregation was a result of "fear of integration itself" and "subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive" of 1954 which ruled public school segregation unconstitutional.

Border States Included

The study, based on compilations in November 1962, showed that Alabama, Mississippi, and South Carolina had no integration at all in public primary and secondary schools.

Professor Morland's findings dealt with Southern and border states school districts. They showed that 31.8 percent of biracial districts have been desegregated in the area.

An over-all percentage of 90.6 was listed for Delaware, District of Columbia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma, and West Virginia.

In the 11 other states, which Professor Morland labeled "resistant" toward desegregation, 11.8 percent of the districts have been desegregated.

States in which all school districts have been desegregated were listed as Delaware, Maryland and West Virginia, plus the District of Columbia.

'Compliant' States

In the "resistant" states, .4 percent of the Negro pupils were in desegregated schools. In the other "compliant" states, Professor Morland said, the percentage was 51.1.

He said that state legislatures have passed at least 379 laws since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling.

"A basic method for keeping desegregation in public schools at token levels has been through the adoption of pupil placement laws," he said.

In actual operation, Professor Morland contended, these laws "have been used with the assumption that initial assignments could be by race. Negroes have been assigned to all-Negro schools and whites to all-white schools, even though ostensibly on criteria other than race."

The professor added:

"In practice, the children who have applied for transfers from schools to which members of their race have been assigned have almost always been Negroes. Thus actual integration of schools has depended upon whether Negro parents and their children were willing to go through time-consuming, expensive steps to contest the initial assignment."

A second anti-integration method, he said, has been "local option" provisions which allow communities to close schools ordered to desegregate.

Stair-Step Plan

"Another device for avoiding integrated schools has been the offer of tuition grants to allow pupils to attend private, nonsectarian schools instead of public schools," Professor Morland said. "Six states—Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, North Carolina, and Virginia — have passed such legislation."

He said, "Still another way of keeping integration at low levels has been the grade-a-year or stair-step plan."

Professor Morland said that if communities "continue to try to maintain de facto racial segregation in their public schools, they can be assured of two things. It will be futile in the long run, and it will be costly."

He said the federal courts have become "less and less patient" with token integration plans and have "blunted and eliminated" many such plans.

"Federal courts," he concluded, "are not going to permit the continuation of racial schools, and states may well be faced with either closing all of their public schools or extending integration beyond token levels."

BOSTON, MASS.
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE
MONITOR
WESTERN EDITION
D. 174,850
JUL 15 1963

Integration Study Examines Schools

By the Associated Press

Atlanta

Fewer than one in 100 Negro pupils in 11 Southern states are attending desegregated schools, according to a study recently released.

The study, "Token Integration and Beyond," was published by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith and the Southern Regional Council, a nonprofit, nonpolitical, biracial research and educational organization.

A professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College in Lynchburg, Va., J. Kenneth Morland, summarized the findings.

He said continued segregation was a result of "fear of integration itself" and "subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive" of 1954 which ruled public school segregation unconstitutional.

Border States Included

The study, based on compilations in November 1962, showed that Alabama, Mississippi, and South Carolina had no integration at all in public primary and secondary schools.

Professor Morland's findings dealt with Southern and border states school districts. They showed that 31.8 percent of biracial districts have been desegregated in the area.

An over-all percentage of 90.6 was listed for Delaware, District of Columbia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma, and West Virginia.

In the 11 other states, which Professor Morland labeled "resistant" toward desegregation, 11.8 percent of the districts have been desegregated.

States in which all school districts have been desegregated were listed as Delaware, Maryland and West Virginia, plus the District of Columbia.

'Compliant' States

In the "resistant" states, .4 percent of the Negro pupils were in desegregated schools. In the other "compliant" states, Professor Morland said, the percentage was 51.1.

He said that state legislatures have passed at least 379 laws since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling.

"A basic method for keeping desegregation in public schools at token levels has been through the adoption of pupil placement laws," he said.

In actual operation, Professor Morland contended, these laws "have been used with the assumption that initial assignments could be by race. Negroes have been assigned to all-Negro schools and whites to all-white schools, even though ostensibly on criteria other than race."

The professor added:

"In practice, the children who have applied for transfers from schools to which members of their race have been assigned have almost always been Negroes. Thus actual integration of schools has depended upon whether Negro parents and their children were willing to go through time-consuming, expensive steps to contest the initial assignment."

A second anti-integration method, he said, has been "local option" provisions which allow communities to close schools ordered to desegregate.

Stair-Step Plan

"Another device for avoiding integrated schools has been the offer of tuition grants to allow pupils to attend private, nonsectarian schools instead of public schools," Professor Morland said. "Six states—Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, North Carolina, and Virginia — have passed such legislation."

He said, "Still another way of keeping integration at low levels has been the grade-a-year or stair-step plan."

Professor Morland said that if communities "continue to try to maintain de facto racial segregation in their public schools, they can be assured of two things. It will be futile in the long run, and it will be costly."

He said the federal courts have become "less and less patient" with token integration plans and have "blunted and eliminated" many such plans.

"Federal courts," he concluded, "are not going to permit the continuation of racial schools, and states may well be faced with either closing all of their public schools or extending integration beyond token levels."

LYNCHBURG, VA.
ADVANCE
D. 18,429

JUL 15 1963

RMWC Professor Says States Face More Integration or School Closing

A Randolph-Macon Woman's College professor believes Southern States "may well be faced with either closing all of their public schools or extending integration beyond token levels" because "Federal courts are not going to permit the continuation of racial schools."

This was the conclusion of Dr. J. Kenneth Morland, head of the sociology and anthropology department at RMWC and a former vice president of the racially integrated Virginia Council on Human Relations, in his summary of a study, "Token Integration and Beyond."

The study was published by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith and the Southern Regional Council, a nonprofit, nonpolitical, biracial and educational organization.

Morland noted that fewer than one in 100 Negroes in 11 Southern states are attending integrated schools.

He said continued segregation was a result of "fear of integration itself" and "subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive" of 1954 which ruled public school segregation unconstitutional.

The study, based on compilations in November 1962, showed that Alabama, Mississippi and South Carolina had no integration at all in public primary and secondary schools.

Morland's findings dealth with Southern and border states school districts. They showed that 31.8 per cent of biracial districts have been desegregated in the area.

An over-all percentage of 90.6 was listed for Delaware, District of Columbia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia.

In the 11 other states, which Morland labeled "resistant" toward desegregation, 11.8 per cent of the districts have been desegregated.

States in which all school districts have been desegregated were listed as Delaware, Maryland and West Virginia, plus the District of Columbia.

In the "resistant" states, .4 per cent of the Negro pupils were in desegregated schools. In the other "complaint" states, Morland said, the percentage was 51.1.

He said that state legislatures have, passed at least 379 laws since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling.

"A basic method for keeping desegregation in public schools at token levels has been through the adoption of pupil placement laws," he said.

In actual operation, Morland contended, these laws "have been used with the assumption that initial assignments could be by race. Negroes have been assigned to all-Negro schools and whites to all-white schools, even though ostensibly on criteria other than race."

The professor added:

"In practice, the children who have applied for transfers from schools to which members of their race have been assigned have almost always been Negroes. Thus actual integration of schools has depended upon whether Negro parents and their children were willing to go through time-consuming, expensive steps to contest the initial assignment."

A second anti-integration method, he said has been "local option" provisions which allow communities to close schools ordered to desegregate.

"Another device for avoiding integrated schools has been the offer of tuition grants to allow pupils to attend private, nonsectarian schools instead of public schools," Morland said. "Six states—Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, North Carolina and Virginia—have passed such legislation."

He said:

"Still another way of keeping integration at low levels has been the grade-a-year or stair-step plan."

Morland said that if communities "continue to try to maintain de facto racial segregation in their public schools, they can be assured of two things. It will be futile in the long run, and it will be costly."

He said the federal courts have become "less and less patient" with token integration plans and have "blunted and eliminated" many such plans.

MIDDLETOWN, N.Y.
TIMES HERALD RECORD
D. 26,298

JUL 15 1963

Report shows south is slow in integrating

ATLANTA (UPI) — A new report on the progress of school desegregation said Saturday that fewer than one out of 200 Negro children in 11 Southern states are now in integrated classes.

The report, published by Southern Regional Council and the Anti-Defamation League, was prepared by J. Kenneth Morland, professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon woman's college, Lynchburg, Va.

The report said the 11 "resistant" states had adopted token integration plans designed "to meet the demands of the Supreme court by allowing some integration while still keeping the number of Negroes in school with whites at such a low level as to maintain de facto (in fact) segregation."

Morland listed pupil placement laws, local option provisions with their school closing authorizations, tuition grants and restrictive transfer plans as the main programs that have kept 99.6 per cent of the Negroes in schools of the 11 states in segregated classes.

Morland singled out as the "resistant" states Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

Previously - segregated areas that have "complied" with the 1954 Supreme Court school desegregation decision were listed as Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma, West Virginia and Washington, D.C.

Morland pointed out that overall school desegregation statistics fail to show the slow pace in the deep South and in some cases hide the facts inside the South.

sas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

Previously - segregated areas that have "complied" with the 1954 Supreme Court school desegregation decision were listed as Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma, West Virginia and Washington, D.C.

Morland pointed out that overall school desegregation statistics fail to show the slow pace in the deep South and in some cases hide the facts inside the South.

He noted that statistics show Nashville, Tenn., with 810 Negroes in schools with whites but that actually 540 of them were in a school with a single white child and a Chinese-American.

Of the 270 desegregated districts in the "resistant" states last fall, 176 were in Texas alone, he said.

"Racial integration in public schools is by any standard at token levels in resistant states, where 98 per cent of the Negro pupils in desegregated districts and 99.6 per cent in all school districts are in segregated schools," Morland concluded.

The federal courts "are not going to permit the continuation of racial schools," Morland emphasized. He said de facto segregation would be "futile in the long run" and very costly.

On the basis of a Civil Rights Commission estimate that one racial case costs $15,000, Morland estimated that litigation over the issue already had cost $4,395,000. There have been 223 cases in "resistant" states and 70 in the others.

He estimated the cost of extraordinary legislative sessions on the race question at $934,000, $7,750,000 for 38,000 tuition grants to children who refused to attend integrated schools and the "less tangible" cost of "handicapping school administrators in improving the quality of education in the public schools."

"Another cost of token integration is the keeping of the race issue alive, the catering to racial prejudice and the giving of false hope to segregationists," Morland wrote.

He said that fear of social troubles and lowering of academic standards governed much of the reluctance to move into integrated programs.

DUBLIN, GA.
COURIER-HERALD
D. 6,543

JUL 16 1963

urts In rders And ecisions

By AL KUETTNER
United Press International

The U. S. Court of Appeals acted wtih an unusual degree of urgency in ordering a Mississippi voting registration list and to stop disregistration lst and to stop discriminating against other Negroes who want to vote.

The appeals court—with judges from Texas, Louisiana and Georgia acting unanimously—told Forrest County Hattiesburg registrar Theron Lynd Monday to comply wth its orders within 10 days or face a trip to prison. Other phases of his case are pending.

It is highly unusual for a federal court specifically to order individuals to be registered for voting. In the only recent case like it, a U. S. court handed down a similar order for a larger group of Negro registrants in Montgomery, Ala.

"MOST UNUSUAL"

The appeals court also said in the Lynd case that it was "most unusual" for that court to hand down an injunction as it did on a temporary basis in the Lynd case.

he Appeal court said it took the action so that the rights of the Negroes involved might be protected while the federal district court conducts a full hearing on a Justice Department request for an injunction against the Hattiesburg registrar. The lower court had earlier refused to grant the injunction.

Civil rights voting cases are expected to become increasingly prominent between now and the 1964 presidential election as Negro organizations step up pledges to "double the Negro registration."

Negro groups are finding the way fairly easy in some sections of the South. It is more difficult in others. Their problem is both opposition from "the courthouse crowd" in rural areas and lethargy on the part of Negroes.

SHOWS SLIGHT INCREASE

Latest figures available from the U. S. Civil Rights Commission and the Voter Education Project (VEP), a get-out-the-Negro-vote drive financed by the Taconic Foundation, show only a slight increase in Negro registration between 1960 and 1962.

A spokesman for the VEP says Misissippi's Negro registration is about 25,000, roughly what it was in 1960 and 1962. That's the low point for the South. There are 422,256 voting-age Negroes in Missisppi, according to most recent figures.

DUBLIN, GA.
COURIER-HERALD
D. 6,543

JUL 16 1963

Federal Courts In Unusual Orders And Haste In Decisions

By AL KUETTNER
United Press International

The U. S. Court of Appeals acted wtih an unusual degree of urgency in ordering a Mississippi voting registration list and to stop disregistration lst and to stop discriminating against other Negroes who want to vote.

The appeals court—with judges from Texas, Louisiana and Georgia acting unanimously—told Forrest County Hattiesburg registrar Theron Lynd Monday to comply wth its orders within 10 days or face a trip to prison. Other phases of his case are pending.

It is highly unusual for a federal court specifically to order individuals to be registered for voting. In the only recent case like it, a U. S. court handed down a similar order for a larger group of Negro registrants in Montgomery, Ala.

"MOST UNUSUAL"

The appeals court also said in the Lynd case that it was "most unusual" for that court to hand down an injunction as it did on a temporary basis in the Lynd case.

he Appeal court said it took the action so that the rights of the Negroes involved might be protected while the federal district court conducts a full hearing on a Justice Department request for an injunction against the Hattiesburg registrar. The lower court had earlier refused to grant the injunction.

Civil rights voting cases are expected to become increasingly prominent between now and the 1964 presidential election as Negro organizations step up pledges to "double the Negro registration."

Negro groups are finding the way fairly easy in some sections of the South. It is more difficult in others. Their problem is both opposition from "the courthouse crowd" in rural areas and lethargy on the part of Negroes.

SHOWS SLIGHT INCREASE

Latest figures available from the U. S. Civil Rights Commission and the Voter Education Project (VEP), a get-out-the-Negro-vote drive financed by the Taconic Foundation, show only a slight increase in Negro registration between 1960 and 1962.

A spokesman for the VEP says Misissippi's Negro registration is about 25,000, roughly what it was in 1960 and 1962. That's the low point for the South. There are 422,256 voting-age Negroes in Missisppi, according to most recent figures.

CHICAGO, ILL.
DAILY DEFENDER
D. 35,795

JUL 16 1963

Find Fewer Than One Out Of 200 Dixie Negro Pupils Integrated

ATLANTA — (UPI) — A new report on the progress of school desegregation said that fewer than one out of 200 Negro children in 11 Southern states are now in integrated classes.

The report, published by Southern Regional Council and the Anti-Defamation League, was prepared by J. Kenneth Morland, professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College, Lynchburg, Va.

The report said the 11 "resistant" states had adopted token integration plans designed "to meet the demands of the Supreme Court by allowing some integration while still keeping the number of Negroes in school with whites at such a low level as to maintain de facto (in fact) segregation."

Morland listed pupil placement laws, local option provisions with their school closing authorizations, tuition grants and restrictive transfer plans as the main programs that have kept 99.6 per cent of the Negroes in schools of the 11 states in segregated classes.

Morland singled out as the "resistant" states Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

Previously-segregated areas that have "complied" with the 1954 Supreme Court school desegregation decision were listed as Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma, West Virginia and the District of Columbia.

Morland pointed out that overall school desegregation statistics fail to show the slow pace in the Deep South and in some cases hide the facts inside the South.

He noted that statistics show Nashville, Tenn., with 810 Negroes in schools with whites but that actually 540 of them were in a school with a single white child and a Chinese-American.

176 IN TEXAS

Of the 270 desegregated districts in the "resistant" states last fall, 176 were in Texas alone, he said.

"Racial integration in public schools is by any standard at token levels in resistant states, where 98 per cent of the Negro pupils in desegregated districts and 99.6 per cent in all school districts are in segregated schools," Morland concluded.

The federal courts "are not going to permit the continuation of racial schools," Morland emphasized. He said de facto segregation would be "futile in the long run" and very costly.

On the basis of a Civil Rights Commission estimate that one racial case costs $15,000, Morland estimated that litigation over the issue already had cost $4,395,000. There have been 223 cases in "resistant" states and 70 in the others.

He estimated the cost of extraordinary legislative sessions on the race question at $934,000, $7,750,000 for 38,000 tuition grants to children who refused to attend integrated schools and the "less tangible" cost of "handicapping school administrators in improving the quality of education in the public schools."

"Another cost of token integration is the keeping of the race issue alive, the catering to racial prejudice and the giving of false hope to segregationists," Morland wrote.

He said that fear of social troubles and lowering of academic standards governed much of the reluctance to move into integrated programs.

"It has been demonstrated repeatedly that when state and local officials act in resolute firmness there has not been violence or serious opposition in carrying out the mandate of the courts," Morland said.

He said there was "no factual support" for fears that Negro pupils in white schools lower academic standards, adding that some school administrators have testified standards were improved with desegregation.

The SRC was formed in 1944 by white and Negro Southerners with the avowed purpose of advancing "equal opportunity for all the South's people."

The Atlanta Journal
"COVERS DIXIE LIKE THE DEW"
D. 259,003

JUL 1 8 1963

Abernathy, Letson to Tell Of Race Meet

Rev. Ralph Abernathy and Dr. John Letson will report on the recent White House conferences on race relations at a dinner meeting Monday of the Greater Atlanta Council on Human Relations.

The human relations group will meet at Stouffer's Restaurant at 7 p.m.

Rev. Mr. Abernathy is an officer in Martin Luther King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference. Dr. Letson is Atlanta school superintendent.

ALSO taking part in the informal discussion will be Dr. Leslie Dunbar, executive director of the Southern Regional Council; Donald Hollowell, Atlanta civil rights lawyer, and Mrs. Grace Hamilton, former head of the Atlanta Urban League. They attended the conferences called by President Kennedy to discuss solutions to the present civil rights controversies.

"In spite of the progress made in Atlanta," council Chairman Mrs. Clifton Hoffman said in announcing the Monday meeting, "Negro citizens still have far less chance for success than whites."

"An Atlanta Negro," she said, "has about half as much chance . . . of completing high school and about one-third as much chance of completing college.

The meeting is open to the public, but reservations are required.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
EASTERN EDITION
D. 174,850

JUL 1 8 1963

Desegregation Walks and Runs

The Supreme Court ordered that schools of the United States should be desegregated with "all deliberate speed." In some instances, according to recently published opinions, this process has moved much too deliberately while in others it is possibly being pushed with too much haste.

In the 11 southeastern states where Negro population is greatest and segregation most entrenched, 99.6 percent of Negro children still attend all-Negro schools, according to a study sponsored by the Southern Regional Council. Pupil placement laws and other measures have largely avoided the integration order thus far.

On the other hand six border states have made changeovers from biracial to nonracial school systems with apparently a considerable degree of success. In them, 51.1 percent of Negro pupils are in schools which also have white children.

A federal judge in North Carolina has ordered a school board to give elementary and junior high school students "the absolute right to attend the school of their choice." But a federal judge in southern Georgia has held that the school board for Savannah is justified in classifying schoolchildren in "coherent groups" according to "educational capabilities" even though this may result in virtually a biracial system.

These are views that will have to be reconciled by appellate courts. Meanwhile, without federal court pressure, some school systems in the North have been having their problems of pupil assignment. In New York City a decision to permit a pupil transfer on grounds that the youth should not be exposed to "possible tension" has come under criticism.

"Preoccupation with racial percentages in the schools," says one objective observer, "is going to have damaging effect" both on some of the better schools and on some which now receive special services. Such adjustments involve thousands of decisions; and they will have to be made one by one rather than in sweeping generalizations.

MORNING DEMOCRAT
DAVENPORT, IOWA
D. 23,007

JUL 1 8 1963

Southern School Segregation Per

By HOYT HARWELL

ATLANTA (AP) — Fewer than one in 100 Negro pupils in 11 southern states are attending desegregated schools, a study showed this week.

The study, "Token Integration and Beyond," was published by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith and the Southern Regional Council, a non - profit, non - political, biracial research and educational organization.

A PROFESSOR OF sociology at Randolph - Macon Woman's College in Lynchburg, Va., J. Kenneth Morland, summarized the findings.

He said continued segregation was a result of "fear of integration itself" and "subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive" of 1954 which ruled public school segregation unconstitutional.

The study, based on compilations in November 1962, showed that Alabama, Mississippi and South Carolina had no integration at all in public primary and secondary schools.

Morland's findings dealt with southern and border states school districts. They showed that 31.8 per cent of biracial districts have been desegregated in the area.

An over-all percentage of 90.6 was listed for Delaware, District of Columbia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia.

In the 11 other states, which Morland labeled "resistant" toward desegregation, 11.8 per cent of the districts have been desegregated.

STATES IN WHICH all school districts have been desegregated were listed as Delaware, Maryland and West Virginia, plus the District of Columbia.

In the "resistant" states, .4 per cent of the Negro pupils were in desegregated schools. In the other "complaint" states, Morland said, the percentage was 51.1.

He said that state legislatures have passed at least 379 laws since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling.

gregation Persists Despite Token Integration land, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia.

In the 11 other states, which Morland labeled "resistant" toward desegregation, 11.8 per cent of the districts have been desegregated.

STATES IN WHICH all school districts have been desegregated were listed as Delaware, Maryland and West Virginia, plus the District of Columbia.

In the "resistant" states, .4 per cent of the Negro pupils were in desegregated schools. In the other "complaint" states, Morland said, the percentage was 51.1.

He said that state legislatures have passed at least 379 laws since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling.

"A basic method for keeping desegregation in public schools at token levels has been through the adoption of pupil placement laws," he said.

IN ACTUAL operation, Morland contended, these laws "have been used with the assumption that initial assignments could be by race. Negroes have been assigned to all-Negro schools and whites to all-white schools, even though ostensibly on criteria other than race."

The professor added:

"In practice, the children who have applied for transfers from schools to which members of their race have been assigned have almost always been Negroes. Thus actual integration of schools has depended upon whether Negro parents and their children were willing to go through time-consuming, expensive steps to contest the initial assignment."

A second anti-integration method, he said, has been "local option" provisions which allow communities to close schools ordered to desegregate.

"ANOTHER DEVICE for avoiding integrated schools has been the offer of tuition grants to allow private, nonsectarian schools instead of public schools," Morland said. "Six states — Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, North Carolina and Virginia — have passed such legislation."

He said:

"Still another way of keeping integration at low levels has been the grade-a-year or stair - step plan."

Morland said that if communities "continue to try to maintain de facto racial segregation in their public schools, they can be assured of two things. It will be futile in the long run, and it will be costly."

He said the federal courts have become "less and less patient" with token integration plans and have "blunted and eliminated" many such plans.

"Federal courts," he concluded, "are not going to permit the continuation of racial schools, and states may well be faced with either closing all of their public schools or extending integration beyond token levels."

BOSTON, MASS.
JEWISH ADVOCATE
W. 35,304

JUL 18 1963

ADL STUDY SEES RESISTANCE TO SCHOOL DESEGREGATION "FUTILE"; CITES PROGRESS IN SIX STATES

Although it is nine years since the Supreme Court decided that segregation in the public schools is unconstitutional, 99.6 percent of Negro pupils in eleven "resistant" states in the South are still attending all-Negro schools, according to a study, "Token Desegregation and Beyond," published recently.

The study was prepared by J. Kenneth Morland, professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Women's College, Lynchburg, Virginia, and published by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith and the Southern Regional Council.

The fact that less than half of one percent of Negroes in all the school districts of the eleven states are now attending desegregated schools was attributed to "fear of integration itself" and "subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive." The eleven states are Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

Prof. Morland said that at least 379 laws have been passed by state legislatures since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling.

He described the following as typical methods of keeping school integration at token levels: Pupil placement laws authorizing a state or local board to assign pupils individually to different schools. When a Negro child applies for admission to a white school, the Board of Education can turn him down, not on grounds of race, but on as many as 20 detailed considerations including transportation, health, etc. "Local Option" provisions which allow communities to close their public schools. Tuition grants enabling pupils to attend private, non-sectarian schools. Restrictive transfer arrangements in schools which comply with the Supreme Court decision by assigning pupils to the school nearest their homes, and then automatically grant white students transfers to the nearest school in which whites are a majority.

According to the Morland study, no precise cataloging of the costs involved in these "devices" can be made. However, estimates show that the price is high. For example, a total of 293 court cases have been filed in state and federal courts at an average cost of about $15,000 each; in Louisiana, tuition grants amounted to some $850,000 in four months and five "Extraordinary Sessions" held by the state legislature to prevent desegregation programs cost $934,000; Virginia's tuition grants totaled more than seven million dollars in five years; Georgia's legislature was forced to amend its law after tuition grants reached $215,987 in one year.

In direct contrast to the effort of the "resistant" states to circumvent desegregation are the results in six "compliant" states which have tended to go along with the Supreme Court decision. In these states Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia 51.1 percent of Negro pupils attend schools with whites and changeovers from bi-racial to non-racial school systems have been made for the most part "creatively and successfully."

Although segregationists warned against "dire consequences" for the quality of education if changes were made, the study declared that school superintendents and statistical reports in desegregated areas refute the fears. The general consensus was that integration had not lowered the academic achievement of either white or Negro students. In addition, school children had shown themselves able to solve problems of adjustment to integration after the initial confrontation was over.

Prof. Morland listed these among the factors determining when desegregation will become a reality: The vigor of the federal government "in demanding the elimination of discrimination." The federal courts, he went on to say, have become "less and less patient" with token integration devices and have "blunted and eliminated" many such plans. The speed with which pupil placement laws, initially accepted as constitutional on their face, are declared unconstitutional as practiced in some school systems. The extent to which school closing is challenged when other public schools in the state remain open and restricted transfer provisions that result in resegregation are rejected.

Prof. Morland warned that token integration has essentially the same goal as massive resistance because it seeks to preserve the established pattern of segregation. He added, however, that the effort "will be futile in the long run."

"Federal courts are not going to permit the continuation of racial schools and states may well be faced with either closing all of their public schools or extending integration beyond token levels," he said.

The study is the first of several to be issued jointly by the Anti-Defamation League and the Southern Regional Council on problems of desegregation. Copies are available from the national office of the Anti-Defamation League, 515 Madison Avenue, New York 22, N. Y. or from the Southern Regional Council, 5 Forsyth Street, N.W., Atlanta 3, Georgia.

ATLANTA, GA.
WORLD
D. 29,800

JUL 20 1963

Token Desegregation

Few Negroes In Desegregated Schools Nine Years After Ruling

Although it is nine years since the Supreme Court decided that segregation in the public schools is unconstitutional, less than half of one per cent of Negro pupils in eleven "resistant" states in the South are now attending desegregated schools, according to a study, "Token Desegregation and Beyond," published Saturday.

The study was prepared by J. Kenneth Morland, professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon woman's College Lynchburg, Virginia, and published by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith and the Southern Regional Council.

The study is the first of several publications planned by ADL and SRC on problems of desegregation. A second study, to be released within the next month, is a psychiatric analysis of the effect of school desegregation in the South, by Dr. Robert M. Coles.

The fact that 99.6 per cent of Negroes in all the school districts of the eleven states are still attending all-Negro schools was attributed to "fear of integration itself" and "subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive." The eleven states are Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia.

379 LAWS PASSED

Professor Morland said at least 379 laws have been passed by state legislatures since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling. He described the following as typical methods of keeping school integration at token levels:

Pupil placement laws authorizing a state or local board to assign pupils individually to different schools. When an Negro child applies for admission to a white school, the Board of Education can turn him down, not on grounds of race, but on as many as 20 detailed considerations including transportation, health, etc.

Local Option" provisions which allow communities to close their public schools.

—Tuition grants enabling pupils to attend private, nonsectarian schools.

—Restrictive transfer arrangements in schools which comply with the Supreme Court decision by assigning pupils to the school nearest their homes, and then automatically grant white students transfers to the nearest school in which whites are a majority.

According to the Morland study, no precise cataloging of the costs involved in these "devices" can be made. However, estimates show that the price is high. for example, a total of 293 court cases have been filed in state and federal courts at an average cost of about $15 000 each; in Louisiana, tutition grants amounted to some $859,000 in four months and five "Exeraordinary Sessions" held by the state legislature to prevent desgregation programs cost $934,000; Virginia's tuition grants totaled more than seven million dollars in five years; Georgia's legislature was forced to amend its law after tuition grants reached $215,987 in one year.

In direct contrast to the efforts of the "resistant" states to circumvent desegregation are the results in six "compliant" states which have tended to go along with the Supreme Court decision. In these states—Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma, and West Virginia—51.1 per cent of Negro to non-racial schools with whites and changeovers from bi-racial to non-racial school systems have been made for the most part "creatively and successfully."

FEARS REFUTED

Although segregationists warned against "dire consequences" for the quality of education if changes were made, the study declared areas refute the fears. The general consensus was that integration had not lowered the academic achievement of either white or Negro students. In addition, school children had shown themselves able to solve problems of adjustment to integration after the initial confrontation was over.

Professor Morland listed these among the factors determining when desegration will become a reality:

—The vigor of the federal government "in demanding the elimination of discrimination." The federal courts, he went on to say, have become "less and less patient" with token integration devices and have "blunted and eliminated" many such plans.

—The speed with which pupil placement laws, initially accepted as constitutional on their face, are declared unconstitutional as practiced in some school systems.

—The extent to which school closing is challenged when other public schools in the state remain open, and restricted transfer provisions that result in resegregation are rejected.

Professor Morland warned that token integration has essentially the same goal as massive resistance because it seeks to preserve the established pattern of segregation. He added, however, that the effort "will be futile in the long run."

"Federal courts are not going to permit the continuation of racial schools, and states may well be faced with either closing all of their public schools or extending integration beyound token levels," he said.

Copies of the study are available from the national office of the Anti-Defamation League, 515 Madison Avenue, New York 22, New York, or from the Southern Regional Council, 5 Forsyth Street, N. W., Atlanta 3, Georgia.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
EASTERN EDITION
D. 174,850

JUL 20 1963

Integration View Blurred

By Bicknell Eubanks
Staff Correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor

Dallas

Token integration has replaced massive resistance in the South as a policy to keep public-school desegregation at a minimum.

While token integration differs from massive resistance in that it does allow for some breakdown of racial barriers, it has the same goal, which is to preserve the pattern of segregation.

It differs from gradual desegregation, which sets a slow pace of changing the status quo, but does make allowance for the eventual end of segregation. Token integration can be used to present a set of statistics that often give a false picture.

Thus, in the nine years since the Supreme Court of the United States decided that segregation of public schools is unconstitutional, the statistics can show that 11.8 percent of the school districts in the 11 states that made up the Confederacy are desegregated.

Ratio Dwindles

A school district is considered desegregated if only one Negro pupil attends school with white children. Yet in these 11 states only 2 percent of the Negro children are in school with white pupils. On a total basis, the ratio is even smaller. Of 2,800,000 children in all school districts, only 12,271, or 0.4 percent attend school with whites.

In a study published jointly by the Southern Regional Council and the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, Dr. J. Kenneth Morland, professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College in Lynchburg, Va., points out that these 11 states, which he describes as resistant, have passed 374 laws since 1954 in an effort to find a legal channel to avoid compliance with the Supreme Court's decisions.

States Listed

The 11 resistant states are listed as Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia.

The pattern of resistance varies. Texas, for example, has 919 biracial school districts in which 7,000 Negroes attend school with whites. Mississippi, Alabama, and South Carolina have no Negroes in school with white pupils.

Fighting desegregation has been an expensive process, according to estimate of legal costs, tuition grants, and other actions taken in the 11 states. Dr. Morland says there is no precise cataloging of the costs. As one example, however, he writes that at least 293 cases have been filed in state and federal courts at an average cost of about $15,000 each.

Grants Tallied

In Louisiana, tuition grants came to about $859,000 in four months, and five special sessions of the Legislature which sought to prevent desegregation cost the taxpayers $934,000. Georgia spent $215,987 in tuition grants in one year.

Dr. Morland notes that the record of the six compliant states is good. These states are Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma, and West Virginia. In these states 51.1 percent of the Negro pupils now attend schools with whites, and 90.6 percent of the school districts are desegregating. In the desegregating districts, 54.8 percent of the Negro pupils attend schools with whites.

Pressures Increased

The federal government, taking cognizance of foot dragging in Southern desegregation, has stepped up pressures. The judicial and executive branches both have taken positive steps. Associate Justice Arthur J. Goldberg, speaking for the Supreme Court, forcefully reminded the South of its slowness in compliance with orders to desegregate public-school facilities.

Mr. Justice Goldberg spoke out in the unanimous court decision ordering that public parks be desegregated immediately in Memphis.

He warned that the 1954 and 1955 decisions never contemplated that the concept of deliberate speed would countenance indefinite delay in removing racial barriers in schools. Mr. Justice Goldberg also implied strongly that some of the desegregation plans might have to be changed to speed up the program.

Mandate Recalled

He said that it is far from clear that the mandate of the court is fully satisfied by the types of plans and programs for desegregation of public educational facilities that might have been considered sufficient when the court issued its mandate of "all deliberate speed" eight years ago.

In his civil-rights message President Kennedy also criticizes this slowness. He has asked Congress to give the Attorney General authority to initiate desegregation suits. He also has asked that the federal government be given discretion to withhold federal funds from any program or activity in which racial discrimination occurs.

PENSACOLA, FLA.
NEWS-JOURNAL
SUN. 60,162

JUL 21 1963

Token Integration Shown in 11 States

ATLANTA, Ga. (AP) — Fewer than one in 100 Negro pupils in 11 Southern states are attending desegregated schools, a study showed today according to a study released last Sunday.

The study, "Token Integration and Beyond," was published by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith and the Southern Regional Council, a nonprofit, nonpolitical, biracial research and educational organization.

A professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Women's College in Lynchburg, Va., J. Kenneth Morland, summarized the findings.

He said continued segregation was a result of "fear of integration itself" and "subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive" of 1954 which ruled public school segregation unconstitutional.

The study, based on compilations in November 1962, showed that Alabama, Mississippi and South Carolina had no integration at all in public primary and secondary schools.

Moreland's findings dealt with Southern and border state school districts. They showed that 31.8 per cent of biracial districts have been desegregated in the area.

An over-all percentage of 90.6 was listed for Delaware, District of Columbia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma and West Virginia.

In the 11 other states, which Morland labeled "resistant" toward desegregation, 11.8 per cent of the districts have been desegregated.

States in which all school districts have been desegregated were listed as Delaware, Maryland and West Virginia, plus the District of Columbia.

In the "resistant" states, .4 per cent of the Negro pupils were in desegregated schools. In the other "compliant" states, Morland said, the percentage was 51.1.

He said that state legislatures have passed at least 379 laws since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling.

"A basic method for keeping desegregation in public schools at token levels has been through the adoption of pupil placement laws," he said.

In actual operation, Morland contended, these laws "have been used with the assumption that initial assignments could be by race. Negroes have been assigned to all-Negro schools and whites to all-white schools, even though ostensibly on criteria other than race."

The professor added:

"In practice, the children who have applied for transfers from schools to which members of their race have been assigned have almost always been Negroes. Thus actual integration of schools has depended upon whether Negro parents and their children were willing to go through time-consuming, expensive steps to contest the initial assignment."

A second anti-integration method, he said, has been "local option" provisions which allow communities to close schools ordered to desegregate.

"Another device for avoiding integrated schools has been the offer of tuition grants to allow pupils to attend private, nonsectarian schools instead of public schools," Morland said. "Six states — Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, North Carolina and Virginia — have passed such legislation."

He said:

"Still another way of keeping integration at low levels has been the grade-a-year or stair-step plan."

Morland said that if communities "continue to try to maintain de facto racial segregation in their public schools, they can be assured of two things. It will be futile in the long run, and it will be costly."

He said the federal courts have become "less and less patient" with token integration plans and have "blunted and eliminated" many such plans.

"Federal courts," he concluded, "are not going to permit the continuation of racial schools, and states may well be faced with either closing all of their public schools or extending integration beyond token levels."

THE ATLANTA CONSTITUTION
For 95 Years the South's Standard Newspaper
D. 202,635

JUL 2 3 1963

Race Push Involves 8 Cities in Georgia

Racial demonstrations protesting segregation have occurred in eight Georgia cities since April 1, according to figures compiled by the Southern Regional Council.

The recent wave of demonstrations in Savannah far exceeded the incidents anywhere else. But both Albany and Atlanta had a number of smaller demonstrations and arrests, the SRC figures showed.

Other cities listed by SRC as having at least some racial demonstrations included Americus, Augusta, Columbus, Macon and Rome.

There were arrests for sit-ins or other demonstrations in seven of the eight cities. The SRC report showed no arrests in Augusta.

There have been more than 1,200 arrests in Savannah since June 3, the SRC figures show, more than twice the combined total of arrests in all other racial demonstrations throughout the state.

100 ARRESTS IN ALBANY

In Albany, there were more than 100 arrests during May and nearly 200 in June and July.

Atlanta has had more than 100 arrests since April 12, most of them arising from sit-in attempts at local restaurants.

On July 12, 11 persons were arrested in Americus after a demonstration at a local movie theater. There were at least 10 arrests in Columbus after Negro demonstrations centering around the city library.

Five Negro girls were arrested in Macon April 22 after sitting-in at a segregated lunch counter. More than 60 high school students were arrested for lunch counter sit-ins in Rome.

10,400 ARRESTS IN SOUTH

The SRC figures indicated that there were more than 10,400 arrests in connection with racial demonstrations in 11 Southern states between April 3 and June 24. Complete figures for states other than Georgia were not available for July.

The Southern Regional Council is a bi-racial research organization, based in Atlanta, whose stated purpose is to promote equal opportunities for all races.

THE ATLANTA CONSTITUTION
For 95 Years the South's Standard Newspaper
D. 202,635

JUL 2 3 1963

Kennedy Held All-Out For Open-Cafe Law

President John F. Kennedy will push hard for his controversial "public accommodations" legislation, the executive director of the Southern Regional Council said here Monday.

Dr. Leslie W. Dunbar said this was the impression he received at a recent White House conference with Kennedy. Between 30 and 40 leaders of civil rights organizations attended the meeting.

"I went into the meeting not believing the administration really thought they could pass public accommodations legislation," Dunbar said, adding that President Kennedy and Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson effectively "argued their sincerity in this."

Dunbar spoke at a dinner meeting of the Greater Atlanta Council on Human Relations, one of several Atlanta speakers to report on the recent series of White House conferences on race relations.

From 25 to 30 Atlanta citizens were invited by the President to attend the special meetings.

Dr. John W. Letson, superintendent of Atlanta schools, said that school "drop-outs" pose a serious racial problem because drop-outs and, later, the "impact of unemployment," fall much "more heavily on the Negro proportion of the population."

Educators attending one White House meeting, he said, recognized the need for a "better guidance program."

The Rev. Ralph Abernathy, Atlanta minister and an official of of the Southern Leadership Conference, said that President Kennedy "did not seek to evade the issues" at a meeting of religious leaders.

President Kennedy urged religious leaders to serve on bi-racial committees in their own communities, the Rev. Mr. Abernathy said.

The Rev. Vincent Harding, who also attended the meeting of religious leaders, noted that there was almost "too much of the public relations aspect to these meetings. There were too many people for him (President Kennedy) really to talk to the people there."

WAYCROSS, GA.
JOURNAL-HERALD
D. 9,872

JUL 24 1963

Voters Crusade Given Funds By 2 Atlanta-Based Groups

ATLANTA (AP) — The Chatham County Crusade for Voters at Savannah received funds from two Atlanta-based organizations for use in Negro voter registration and education drives, officials of the organizations say.

Leslie W. Dunbar, director of the Southern Regional Council, said Tuesday that his group granted $4,000 to the crusade last fall. Another $4,000 was approved last May, he said, but it was withdrawn when the Savannah group became involved in massive antisegregation demonstrations.

"We were very careful to be sure that the money was not spent on direct action (demonstrations)," said Jack Minnis, research director for the SRC's voter education project.

"When it became apparent that the crusade was engaged in other kinds of demonstrations, we, with agreement of the crusade, suspended the program," Dunbar added.

He said the SRC had suggested that $3,000 of the first grant be spent in Chatham County and the remaining $1,000 on voter education in seven other counties in the 1st District.

The second grant was withdrawn after $400 already had been spent.

A spokesman for the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, headed by Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., said the organization put about $7,200 into a Negro voter education program in Chatham County.

The Rev. Andrew Young, program director for the SCLC, said the program probably would be renewed in the fall.

Commenting on reports the Savannah crusade had headquarters in the offices of a labor union described by a government agency as Communist influenced, Young said it "was one of those coincidences which I wasn't aware of."

He said there was "absolutely no connection" between the crusade and communism.

Young said the crusade paid utility bills for the building in lieu of rent because of a stipulation forbidding the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers to sublet any of the offices.

The union was described last year by the Subversive Activities Board as "Communist - infiltrated." The union has appealed.

The union makes contributions to the crusade, Young said, "sometimes $50, sometimes $100."

But, he said, "It is no more than a large church would give."

COLUMBUS, GA.
LEDGER
D. 29,884

JUL 24 1963

Fulton Units Aided Chatham Vote Bid

ATLANTA (AP) — The Chatham County Crusade for Voters at Savannah received funds from two Atlanta-based organizations for use in Negro voter registration and education drives, officials of the organizations say.

Leslie W. Dunbar, director of the Southern Regional Council, said yesterday that his group granted $4,000 to the crusade last fall. Another $4,000 was approved last May, he said, but it was withdrawn when the Savannah group became involved in massive antisegregation demonstrations.

"We were very careful to be sure that the money was not spent on direct action (demonstrations)," said Jack Minnis, research director for the SRC's voter education project.

"When it became apparent that the crusade was engaged in other kinds of demonstrations, we, with agreement of the crusade, suspended the program," Dunbar added.

He said the SRC had suggested that $3,000 of the first grant be spent in Chatham County and the remaining $1,000 on voter education in seven other counties in the 1st District.

The second grant was withdrawn after $400 already had been spent.

A spokesman for the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, headed by Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., said the organization put about $7,200 into a Negro voter education program in Chatham County.

The Rev. Andrew Young, program director for the SCLC, said the program probably would be renewed in the fall.

Not Aware

Commenting on reports the Savannah crusade had headquarters in the offices of a labor union described by a government agency as Communiht influenced, Young said it "was one of those coincidences which I wasn't aware of."

He said there was "absolutely no connection" between the crusade and communism.

Young said the crusade paid utility bills for the building in lieu of rent because of a stipulation forbidding the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers to sublet any of the offices.

THOMASVILLE, GA.
TIMES-ENTERPRISE
D. 6,183

JUL 24 1963

Atlanta Funds Back Chatham Voter Crusade

ATLANTA (AP) — The Chatham County Crusade for Voters at Savannah received funds from two Atlanta-based organizations for use in Negro voter registration and education drives, officials of the organizations say.

Leslie W. Dunbar, director of the Southern Regional Council, said Tuesday that his group granted $4,000 to the crusade last fall. Another $4,000 was approved last May, he said, but it was withdrawn when the Savannah group became involved in massive antisegregation demonstrations.

"We were very careful to be sure that the money was not spent on direct action (demonstrations)," said Jack Minnis, research director for the SRC's voter education project.

"When it became apparent that the crusade was engaged in other kinds of demonstrations, we, with agreement of the crusade, suspended the program," Dunbar added.

He said the SRC had suggested that $3,000 of the first grant be spent in Chatham County and the remaining $1,000 on voter education in seven other counties in the 1st District.

The second grant was withdrawn after $400 already had been spent.

A spokesman for the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, headed by Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., said the organization put about $7,200 into a Negro voter education program in Chatham County.

The Rev. Andrew Young, program director for the SCLC, said the program probably would be renewed in the fall.

Commenting on reports the Savannah crusade had headquarters in the offices of a labor union described by a government agency as Communist influenced, Young said it "was one of those coincidences which I wasn't aware of."

He said there was "absolutely no connection" between the crusade and communism.

Young said the crusade paid utility bills for the building in lieu of rent because of a stipulation forbidding the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers to sublet any of the offices.

The union was described last year by the Subversive Activities Board as "Communist - infiltrated." The union has appealed.

The union makes contributions to the crusade, Young said, "sometimes $50, sometimes $100."

But, he said, "It is no more than a large church would give."

SAVANNAH, GA.
PRESS
D. 24,262 PAGE ONE CERTIFIED

JUL 24 1963

Came Out of Atlanta

$15,200 Was Set Up For Negro Use Here

ATLANTA (AP) — The Chatham County Crusade for Voters at Savannah received funds from two Atlanta-based organizations for use in Negro voter registration and education drives, officials of the organizations say.

Leslie W. Dunbar, director of the Southern Regional Council, said Tuesday that his group granted $4,000 to the crusade last fall. Another $4,000 was approved last May, he said, but it was withdrawn when the Savannah group became involved in massive antisegregation demonstrations.

"We were very careful to be sure that the money was not spent on direct action (demonstrations)," said Jack Minnis, research director for the SRC's voter education project.

"When it became apparent that the crusade was engaged in other kinds of demonstrations, we, with agreement of the crusade, suspended the program," Dunbar added.

He said the SRC had suggested that $3,000 of the first grant be spent in Chatham County and the remaining $1,000 on voter education in seven other counties in the 1st District.

The second grant was withdrawn after $400 already had been spent.

A spokesman for the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, headed by Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., said the organization put about $7,200 into a Negro voter education program in Chatham County.

The Rev. Andrew Young, program director for the SCLC, said the program probably would be renewed in the fall.

Commenting on reports the Savannah crusade had headquarters in the offices of a labor union described by a government agency as Communist influenced, Young said it "was one of those coincidences which I wasn't aware of."

He said there was "absolutely no connection" between the crusade and communism.

Young said the crusade paid utility bills for the building in lieu of rent because of a stipulation forbidding the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers to sublet any of the offices.

The union was described last year by the Subversive Activities Board as "Communist - infiltrated." The union has appealed.

The union makes contributions to the crusade, Young said, "sometimes $50, sometimes $100."

But, he said, "It is no more than a large church would give."

VALDOSTA, GA.
TIMES
D. 14,015

JUL 24 1963

CHATHAM VOTER DRIVE GIVEN ATLANTA FUNDS

ATLANTA (AP) — The Chatham County Crusade for Voters at Savannah received funds from two Atlanta - based organizations for use in Negro voter registration and education drives, officials of the organizations say.

Leslie W. Dunbar, director of the Southern Regional Council, said Tuesday that his group granted $4,000 to the crusade last fall. Another $4,000 was approved last May, he said, but it was withdrawn when the Savannah group became involved in massive antisegregation demonstrations.

"We were very careful to be sure that the money was not spent on direct action (demonstrations)," said Jack Minnis, research director for the SRC's voter education project.

"When it became apparent that the crusade was engaged in other kinds of demonstrations, we, with agreement of the crusade, suspended the program," Dunbar added.

He said the SRC had suggested that $3,000 of the first grant be spent in Chatham County and the remaining $1,000 on voter education in seven other counties in the 1st District.

The second grant was withdrawn after $400 already had been spent.

A spokesman for the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, headed by Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., said the organization put about $7,200 into a Negro voter education program in Chatham County.

The Rev. Andrew Young, program director for the SCLC, said the program probably would be renewed in the fall.

Commenting on reports the Savannah crusade had headquarters in the offices of a labor union described by a government agency as Communist influenced, Young said it "was one of those coincidence which I wasn't aware of."

He said there was "absolutely no connection" between the crusade and communism.

Young said the crusade paid utility bills for the building in lieu of rent because of a stipulation forbidding the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers to sublet any of the offices.

The union was described last year by the Subversive Activities Board as "Communist - infiltrated." The union has appealed.

The union makes contributions to the crusade, Young said, "sometimes $50, sometimes $100."

But, he said, "It is no more than a large church would give."

ALBANY, GA.
HERALD
D. 27,154 S. 26,791

JUL 24 1963

Negroes Get Cash Backing For Savannah Activities

ATLANTA (AP) — The Chatham County Crusade for Voters at Savannah received funds from two Atlanta-based organizations for use in Negro voter registration and education drives, officials of the organizations say.

Leslie W. Dunbar, director of the Southern Regional Council, said Tuesday that his group granted $4,000 to the crusade last fall. Another $4,000 was approved last May, he said, but it was withdrawn when the Savannah group became involved in massive antisegregation demonstrations.

"We were very careful to be sure that the money was not spent on direct action (demonstrations)," said Jack Minnis, research director for the SRC's voter education project.

"When it became apparent that the crusade was engaged in other kinds of demonstrations, we, with agreement of the crusade, suspended the program," Dunbar added.

He said the SRC had suggested that $3,000 of the first grant be spent in Chatham County and the remaining $1,000 on voter education in seven other counties in the 1st District.

The second grant was withdrawn after $400 already had been spent.

A spokesman for the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, headed by Martin Luther King Jr., said the organization put about $7,200 into a Negro voter education program in Chatham County.

Andrew Young, program director for the SCLC, said the program probably would be renewed in the fall.

Commenting on reports the Savannah crusade had headquarters in the offices of a labor union described by a government agency as Communist influenced, Young said it "was one of those coincidences which I wasn't aware of."

He said there was "absolutely no connection" between the crusade and communism.

Young said the crusade paid utility bills for the building in lieu of rent because of a stipulation forbidding the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers to sublet any of the offices.

The union was described last year by the Subversive Activities Board as "Communist - infiltrated." The union has appealed.

The union makes contributions to the crusade, Young said, "sometimes $50, sometimes $100."

But, he said, "It is no more than a large church would give."

ATLANTA, GA.
WORLD (N)
D. 29,800

JUL 26 1963

SPORTS OF THE WORLD

BY MARION E. JACKSON

There are now in excess of 40 former major leaguers now coaching baseball in U. S. colleges and universities . . . Kentucky State College may rejoin the ranks of major football powers. Dr. Carl M. Hill, president of the Frankfort, Ky., institution, was a two-time All-American footballer at Hampton Institute. The new KSC president also was former chairman of the Athletic Committee at Tennessee A & I University . . . E. J. (Ox) Clemons returns to Atlanta, August 1.

Dr. Carl M. Hill, who took office at Kentucky State College, has changed the mission of his school, to an institution to one for all students, irrespective of race.

—0—

Kentucky State functioned as an all - Negro institution until May 17, 1954 when the U. S. Supreme Court opened the doors to all races. While it has had white students since then, its athletic teams have remained all - Negro.

—0—

Dr. Hill has signified his intention to recruit without regards to race, although he faces rugged competition from four state -supported institutions in Kentucky.

—0—

Kentucky State presently has an enrollment of 1,000. Twenty - six percent of the school's stuednts are white this summer. Last semester, five per cent of the student body was white.

—0—

Peru's national basketball team will stop at Kentucky State next December on its U. S. tour. For 1964-65, KSC will schedule predominantly mixed basketball opponents.

—0—

FACT SHEET — The Extra Point Club and the 100 Per Cent Wrong Slub, two stalwart Atlanta sports organizations, will sponsor a joint picnic, Saturday, July 27 at t he Line Roadclub, 120 Line Road S W. This is the second straight year the sportsmen have combin-

Vocational School star, will receive his degree in recreation at Grambling College in August.

—0—

Hardnett was signed in 1961 by the Chicago Zephyrs of the National Basketball Association. Recently, he inked his second professional contract with the Baltimore Bullets, who as the Zephyrs didn't cleik in the Windy City.

—0—

The 6-10 star was a Grambling College pacesetter for four years, earning All - American honors as a junior and senior.

—0—

An award - winning player, Hardnet has been honored by the 100 Per Cent Worng Club of the Atlanta Daily World and the Sportsmen 25 Club.

—0—

A real clean - cut fellow with a likeable personality, Hardnett will continue to make his home in Atlanta.

—0—

With the Zephyrs, Hardnett was second in rebounds behind Walter Bellamy and fourth in scoring with a 10.5 average. As a first year man NBA scorers insist this is a better than average statistic.

—0—

Hardnett was coached by Alexander Sheppard, now topkick at C. W. Harper High School.

Peru's national basketball team will stop at Kentucky State next December on its U. S. tour. For 1964-65, KSC will schedule predominantly mixed basketball opponents.

—0—

FACT SHEET — The Extra Point Club and the 100 Per Cent Wrong Slub, two stalwart Atlanta sports organizations, will sponsor a joint picnic, Saturday, July 27 at t he Line Roadclub, 120 Line Road S W. This is the second straight year, the sportsmen have combined for a summer outing.

—0—

Hubert M. Jackson is president of the Extra Point Club which sponsors the Dec. 5-7, 1963 Georgia Invitational Basketball Tournament at Morehouse College. A. L. Thompson heads the 100 Per Centers.

—0—

The 100 Per Cent Wrong Club of the Atlanta Daily World in conjunction with the Coca-Cola Company of Atlanta, Ga., the Atlanta Coca- Cola Bottling Company and the Atlanta Life Insurance Company sponsor the club.

—0—

Families of the Extra Pointers and 100 Per Centers will make the trek to the picturesque Line Road Club, which is one of Atlanta's fine sphas.

—0—

Sunday, July 27, Atlanta Daily World employees will hold their annual outing at Jordan's Lake. This fine playground is owned by Atlanta caterer, Mrs. Mary Jordan.

Mrs. Jordan is one of the best-known business women in the Gate City. For years, she has won success in the catering field. Most of her business is now handled by a Dinslow Jordan. She is also the mother of Vernon Jordan, who is employed by the Southern Regional Council. A summer outing is also planned by the Joymen Club for July 27.

—0—

There is a bit of Americana in this nation's moving to the great outdoors in the summer and these picnics are in line with the fine traditions of the season.

SPORTS BEAT — Arthur McAfee ,who formerly coached at Lane, Mississippi Vocational and Lincoln (Mo.) has been named head basketball coach at Bishop College in Dallas, Texas.

—0—

McAfee succeeds Tommy Torain, former Tennessee A & I State University, football and track star Torain guided the Tiger cagers for one year. He will remain on the Bishop College staff as an assistant coach.

—0—

McAfee is a native of Wichita, Kansas and a graduate of Wichita University, where he starred on the basketball team....

—0—

Charles Hardnett, the former Atlanta George Washington Carver

—0—

With the Zephyrs, Hardnett was second in rebounds behind Walter Bellamy and fourth in scoring with a 10.5 average. As a first year man NBA scorers insist this is a better than average statistic.

—0—

Hardnett was coached by Alexander Sheppard, now topkick at C. W. Harper High School.

NEW YORK
Amsterdam News
W. 59,266

JUL 27 1963

9 Years Since Decision

Less Than ½ Per Cent In 11 States In South In Desegregated Schools

ATLANTA, Ga. — Although it is nine years since the Supreme Court decided that segregation in the public schools is unconstitutional, less than half of one per cent of Negro pupils in eleven "resistant" states in the South are now attending desegregated schools, according to a study, "Token Desegregation and Beyond," published Sunday.

The study was prepared by J. Kenneth Morland, professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon Woman's College, Lynchburg, Virginia, and published by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith and the Southern Regional Council.

The study is the first of several publications planned by ADL and SRC on problems of desegregation. A second study, to be released within the next month, is a psychiatric analysis of the effects of school desegregation in the South, by Dr. Robert M. Coles.

Fear, Subterfuge

The fact that 99.6 per cent of Negroes in all the school districts of the eleven states are still attending all-Negro schools was attributed to "fear of integration itself" and "subterfuge in complying with the Supreme Court directive." The eleven states are Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

Professor Morland said at least 379 laws have been passed by state legislatures since 1954 in attempts to legally avoid compliance with the Supreme Court ruling. He described the following as typical methods of keeping school integration at token levels:

—Pupil placement laws authorizing a state of local board to assign pupils individually to different schools. When a Negro child applies for admission to a white school, the Board of Education can turn him down, not on grounds of race, but on as many as 20 detailed considerations including transportation, health, etc.

—"Local Option" provisions which allow communities to close their public schools.

Tuition grants

—Tuition grants enabling pupils to attend private, non-sectarian schools.

—Restrictive transfer arrangements in schools which comply with the Supreme Court decision by assigning pupils to the school nearest their homes, and then automatically grant white students transfers to the nearest school in which whites are a majority.

According to the Morland study, no precise cataloging of the costs involved in these "devices" can be made. However, estimates show that the price is high.

For example, a total of 293 court cases have been filed in state and federal courts at an average cost of about $15,000 each; in Louisiana, tuition grants amounted to some $859,000 in four months and five "Extraordinary Sessions" held by the state legislature to prevent desegregation programs cost $934,000; Virginia's tuition grants totaled more than seven million dollars in five years; Georgia's legislature was forced to amend its law after tuition grants reached $215,987 in one year.

In contrast

In direct contrast to the efforts of the "resistant" states to circumvent desegregation are the results in six "compliant" states which have tended to go along with the Supreme Court decision. In these states—Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma, and West Virginia—51.1 per cent of Negro pupils attend schools with whites and changeovers from bi-racial to non-racial school systems have been made for the most part "creatively and successfully."

Although segregationists warned against "dire consequences" for the quality of education if changes were made, the study declared that school superintendents and statistical reports in desegregated areas refute the fears.

The general consensus was that integration had not lowered the academic achievement of either white or Negro students. In addition, school children had shown themselves able to solve problems of adjustment to integration after the initial confrontation was over.

Federal vigor

Professor Morland listed these among the factors determining when desegregation will become a reality:

—The vigor of the federal government "in demanding the elimation of discrimination." The federal courts, he went on to say, have become "less and less patient" with token integration devices and have "blunted and eliminated" many such plans.

—The speed with which pupil placement laws, initially accepted as constitutional on their face, are declared unconstitutional as practiced in some school systems.

—The extent to which school closing is challenged when other public schools in the state remain open, and restricted transfer provisions that result in resegregation are rejected.

Professor Morland warned that token integration has essentially the same goal as massive resistance because it seeks to preserve the established pattern of segregation. He added, however, that the effort "will be futile in the long run."

"Federal courts are not going to permit the continuation of racial schools and states may well be faced with either closing all of their public schools or extending integration beyond token levels," he said.

Copies of the study are available from the national office of the Anti-Defamation League, 515 Madison Avenue, New York 22, New York, or from the Southern Regional Council, 5 Forsyth St. N. W., Atlanta 3, Georgia.

JACKSON, MISS.
CLARION-LEDGER NEWS
SUN. 89,888

JUL 28 1963

Barnett Put Highlander School Right Into National Spotlight

If Governor Ross Barnett did nothing more than spotlight the Highlander Folk School of Monteagle, Tenn., in his appearance before the Senate Commerce Committee in Washington, he would have served a good purpose.

Of course he did much more, for it has now been admitted by Martin Luther King that one of his associates of recent days, Jack O'Dell of New York, has been linked by Congressional committees to the communist organization.

Back to the Highlander school, the institution, closed at Monteagle but moved to Knoxville where it is called a research and education center, is receiving nationwide attention after Gov. Barnett's reference to it.

Many a story and editorial are being written about the School, located near the mountain resort. Newspapers everwhere are digging up connections between the school and the agitators present in many areas of the south. Many of these got their training at Highlander.

In the Savannah, Ga., area, it was said that many adults were sent to school for training before returning for crusading work in that section.

The Southeastern Georgia Crusade for Voters has rentfree quarters furnished by the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers, a union found to be communist - controlled by the Subversive Activities Control Board of Georgia, a finding now under court appeal.

The Crusade is an affiliate of Martin Luther King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference. It has received $4,000 from the Southern Regional Council of Atlanta, according to the Atlanta Constitution staffer, Bill Shipp.

Meanwhile, the Nashville Banner, published not too far from the Highlander operating base before it moved, discusses the "joy of living" and tax exemption privileges of the school in a lengthy editorial.

Says the Banner, "Highlander Folk School, it seems, has always been able to work a little "joie de vivre" into its mission. A pioneer in the field of integration, its avowed good works were undertaken in the early thirties, long before the Supreme Court confirmed the practices of the institution with stern orders for the mixing of the races.

"While many alumni have gone forth to remake the world by participating in deadly serious demonstrations, in some cases with the grim assistance at times of Federal troops, the loyal Highlander must look back with longing to the days of good fellowship and congeniality at the old alma mater.

"For example, there was the Labor Day celebration in 1957. Recently sworn testimony before a Congressional committee was to the effect that the now famous Dr. Martin Luther King was there, along with an alleged Communist or two and a considerable representation from Red front organizations.

"But as usual, at the idealistic refuge on the mountain not far from Monteagle, the agenda did not call for all work and no play. Photographic evidence shows breaks for dancing, swimming and other forms of relaxation. During the court hearing that ended in padlocking the school, the picture presented was hardly that of a religious convocation.

"But when the place was closed by the law, the director was undaunted. With whatever assets remained, he removed to Knoxville and set up the Highlander Research and Education Center. In a recent letter to friends and contributors, he proclaimed the Highlander "idea" had been "born anew, like Phoenix rising out of the ashes."

"The communication also contained the glad tidings that Mr. Kennedy's Internal Revenue Service had concluded the Center need not pay income taxes and that all who wished have a part in furthering a good cause could deduct their donations on their annual returns.

That must have been inspiring news for the harassed business man who needs to relax on a trip occasionally and entertain a few faithful customers. Then while the taxpayer might have been fretting about discrimination on the matter of deductible pleasure, some Highlander "researchers" decided that all work and no play tends to dull the edge of ideals.

"Knoxville newspaper bloomed out a few weeks ago with headlines about a Highlander camp in neighboring Blount County that caught the attention of the high sheriff. He decided to make an unannounced call, accompanied by deputies, with the net result that a group of Negroes and whites were hauled into court. Seven were bound over to the grand jury. There would have been eight, except that a judge was shocked to learn that one of the white girls was only 15 years old. Then there were seven. The charge: contributing to the delinquency of a minor. Some fines were also assessed for lewdness, disorderly conduct and possession of whisky.

"A story in the Knoxville Journal quoted the Judge as saying that the involvement of Negroes and whites had no effect upon his decisions, and that anonymous efforts to intimidate him by telephone had been useless. Then came the statement from the bench that there had been "scandalous and lewd" activity at the camp and the officers charged only those they could identify.

"Faced with the consequences of desegregation with joie de vivre, Director Horton told the court the camp was set up so people from the North and the South, as well as college students from all over the country, could get closer together and discuss their problems.

"There is no indication as yet, however, that the explanatory plea for tax exempt "togetherness" will satisfy the demands of the legal and moral standards of historic Blount County."

RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER
D. 120,884

JUL 3 1 1963

Protest Methods Explained

Special to The News Leader

HOPEWELL, July 31 — The Rev. Virgil Wood of Lynchburg has spoken to the Hopewell Council on Human Relations on "The Non-Violent Method." Mr. Wood was one of the participants in recent Danville demonstrations and is out on bond, pending a hearing on a charge in connection with the protests. He is pastor of the Diamond Hill Baptist Church of Lynchburg and has been active in civil rights causes in the Hill City.

Mr. Wood last night explained some of the techniques of the non-violent method and emphasized the need for the "black man and the white to work together for the common good."

He stated these are times of war—a war of ideals and ideologies.

"The whole philosophy (of non-violent action) arises from the profound love of the Master and there is the opportunity for the people of this community to share what can be one of the greatest experiences of mankind," he said.

COURSE TAUGHT

Mr. Wood noted that demonstrators are subject to a strong course in self-discipline, acting out beforehand the things that could happen to them in a demonstration.

Thus are weeded out the people who cannot stand the hurt and the humiliation of the non-violent demonstrations, he noted. Mr. Wood also mentioned that many times when they march, Negroes and whites who have not been disciplined join in on the outskirts of the march and often it is these people who "fight back."

He hopes that in the future this situation may be avoided by properly trained guards from the non-violent organization.

The Hopewell Council for Human Relations was organized in May by a group of local people, including an approximate equal number of whites and Negroes. It is a member of the Virginia Council of Human Relations and the Southern Regional Council.

PASTOR PRESIDENT

The Rev. Eugene Ensley, president of the Hopewell council, stated that the monthly programs will not necessarily deal with racial problems.

"One of the aims is to get the people of the two races together and to stop thinking in terms of black and white," stated Mr. Ensley.

Mr. Easley emphasized that the council is not concerned solely with race relations but with all kinds of problems among people. The racial problem is paramount today and receives perhaps a greater share of attention at this time, he observed.

Committees have been appointed to cover such fields as education, governmental agencies, fair employment, and housing. Their job will be to discover what human relations problems are created and how they can be helped.

The next meeting will beheld on August 15 at the Community building. Nick Mathias, director of recreation for the city of Hopewell, will be the principal speaker. His subject will be the Recreational Program of Hopewell As It Affects the Racial Problem."

THE CHARLOTTE NEWS
CHARLOTTE, N. C.
D. 62,581

AUG 1 1963

The Deepening Crisis

'I Just Want To Become A Citizen Of Our Country'

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP)— The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form.

A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order.

He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make a full citizen."

* * *

THIS SCENE — with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement — is being reenacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands who never voted before. As the number grows, political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the Courthouse immediately.

If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

* * *

OR THEY STATION themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard.

The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. This is the fourth in a special series of articles on the racial crisis.

EXACT FIGURES for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341.

In Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites — sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

* * *

FOR EXAMPLE, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

". . . 18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation.

Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, 'there shall be no imprisonment for debt.'"

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News And World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the State of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

* * *

THERE HAVE been indications already — although it is difficult to say with certainty — that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

TOMORROW: The economic effects.

THE KANSAS CITY STAR
KANSAS CITY, MO.
D. 336,484 S. 370,535

AUG 1 1963

The Deepening Crisis—II

Negroes Could Wield Political Punch

In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. This is another in a special series of articles on the racial crisis.

By Relman Morin

TUSKEGEE, ALA. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote. She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. An official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

Wants Full Standing

"I just want to become a citizen of our country," she says. "Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter registration drive. Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels. The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

All-Out in Drive

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering.

"And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice department official said, Negro NEGROES LEARN HOW TO REGISTER—The Rev. Fred C. Bennette, jr., instructs a group in Atlanta on how to fill out forms enabling them to vote. Similar classes are held in many southern cities for thousands who never have voted—(Wirephoto).

grows, the political leverage o the Negro increases. Here, po tentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation

The drive moves through many channels. The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

All-Out in Drive

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering.

"And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 a month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one—many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

As to literacy qualifications for registering, Gov. Ross Barnett of Mississippi, says:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

In Doubt on Effects

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for

SAN FRANCISCO
News Call Bulletin
D. 190,260 SAT. 162,823

AUG 1 1963

The Negro Finds Power In His Right to Vote

In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. This is the fourth in a specialized series of articles by the Associated Press on the racial crisis.

THE DEEPENING CRISIS
—Chapter Four—

By Relman Morin

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association (TCA), a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement — is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter registration drive.

ings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Southern Regional Council's "Voter Education Project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette counties, a Justice Dept. official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5000 in five years.

Progress Made In Alabama

Bullock County, Ala., had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961. Now the figure is 1341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now

ty. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

" . . . 18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House judiciary committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, mean-a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement — is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly - repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Negro Workers Ring Doorbells

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Another device is the "Voter Clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, north and south."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Dept. of Justice and the

Progress Made In Alabama

Bullock County, Ala., had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961. Now the figure is 1341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one—many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon Coun-

Similarly, in testimony before the House judiciary committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile, have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt'."

Barnett's View On Negro Vote

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U. S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indica-

Fort Worth Star-Telegram
FORT WORTH, TEXAS
D. 105,967 S. 211,467

AUG 1 1963

NEGROES DRIVING FOR VOTES

Politics Changing in South

(One of a series)

BY RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala., Aug. 1 (AP) The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association (TCA), a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

* * *

THROUGHOUT THE SOUTH, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

* * *

SPEAKING OF the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

* * *

COMPARABLE FIGURES for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites —sometimes by as much as five to one—many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

". . . 18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile, have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U. S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

* * *

AS NEGRO VOTING strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already — although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

NEW BERN, N.C.
SUN JOURNAL
D. 8,479

AUG 1 1963

Voter Registration Drive Staged In South By Negro Organizations

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwse, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

DEEPENDING CRISIS IV Gal 2

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simply provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

ASHEVILLE, N.C.
TIMES
D. 25,649

AUG 1 1963

Negroes Push Massive Vote Registration Campaign

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP)— The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being reenacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carryng a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simply provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

MARSHFIELD, WIS.
NEWS-HERALD
D. 11,704

AUG 1 1963

NEGROES LEARN REGISTRATION PROCEDURES—Rev. Fred C. Bennette Jr. instructs Atlanta Negroes how to fill out registration forms which will enable them to vote. Similar classes are held in other cities in an effort to increase Negro voting power which, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation. Seated from left are: Austin L. Hayes, Mrs. Dollie M. Shepherd and Mrs. Hattie Ward. (AP Wirephoto)

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

The Deepening Crisis:

Voter Registration Is Weapon In Battle Against Segregation

EDITOR'S NOTE—In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Another in a specialized series of articles by The Associated Press on the racial crisis.

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

★ ★ ★

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simply provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

★ ★ ★

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

NEXT: The economic effects.

NEGROES LEARN REGISTRATION PROCEDURES—Rev. Fred C. Bennette Jr. instructs Atlanta Negroes how to fill out registration forms which will enable them to vote. Similar classes are held in other cities in an effort to increase Negro voting power which, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation. Seated from left are: Austin L. Hayes, Mrs. Dollie M. Shepherd and Mrs. Hattie Ward. (AP Wirephoto)

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

The Deepening Crisis:

Voter Registration Is Weapon In Battle Against Segregation

EDITOR'S NOTE—In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Another in a specialized series of articles by The Associated Press on the racial crisis.

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

★ ★ ★

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

★ ★ ★

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced inter-

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simply provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.'"

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't be-

In Tuskegee, Ala., Ne ers say they already o the whites in registered Thus, theoretically, the elect a mayor and an e government. But William ell, executive secretary Tuskegee Civic Associati

"We would discourage Negro slate. We don't wa domination and we have that for years.

"We just want to vote best qualified man."

NEXT: The economic

SYRACUSE
Herald-Journal
D. 132,375

AUG 1 1963

Southern Negroes Pin Major Hopes on Voter Registration Campaign

(Another in an Associated Press series on the racial situation in the United States.)

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Associataion, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells here where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

Voter Drive

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Ring Doorbells

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Seek 2 Million

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Many Devices

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

RFK Testimony

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile, have been asked to copy suchsimple provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report, he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

'Moderate' Views

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

Tomorrow—The Economic Effects

sands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Ring Doorbells

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Seek 2 Million

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

Score Large Gain

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures

Staten Island Advance
STATEN ISLAND, N. Y.
D. 52,799 S. 48,254

AUG 1 1963

Crisis in America--Changes in the Political Picture

EDITOR'S NOTE—In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Fourth in a specialized series of articles by The Associated Press on the racial crisis.

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen.'

* * *

THIS scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

* * *

ANOTHER device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accompanied substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

* * *

THE movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

* * *

ESPECIALLY in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

* * *

SIMILARLY, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile, have been asked to copy such simply provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report, he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

As negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

Next: The economic effects.

NO VOTE — Negro efforts to obtain greater voting power include demonstrations such as this—a mock wake for the 15th Amendment, which demonstrators say is dead in Mississippi. The "Wake" was held in March on the steps of the post office in Atlanta, Ga.

REGISTRATION — Atlanta, Ga., Negroes receive instructions on how to fill out registration forms which will enable them to vote. Similar classes are held in other cities in an effort to increase Negro power.

SAN ANTONIO Evening NEWS
SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
D. 70,118

AUG 1 1963

Deepening Crisis

Negro Seeks Vote 'To Become Citizen'

EDITOR'S NOTE—In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Fourth in a specialized series of articles by The Associated Press on the racial crisis.

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Vote Register Drive

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

'Voter Clinic'

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum two million new Negro voters, North and South."

Movement Gains

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Power Devices

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

Registration Ordered

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a ready—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

BOB KENNEDY'S TEAM IN ACTION—Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy, left, sits in his Washington office during an informal meeting with members of a special team he often calls to work out solutions to urgent problems. Informality is the keynote at such meetings. From left are Kennedy; Burke Marshall, assistant attorney general for civil rights; Nicholas deB. Katzehbach, Kennedy's deputy; John Nolan, Kennedy's administrative assistant; William A. Geoghegan, assistant deputy attorney general; and Joseph F. Dolan, assistant deputy attorney general. —AP Wirephoto.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

NEXT: THE ECONOMIC EFFECTS.

WEST WARWICK, R.I.
PAWTUXET VALLEY TIMES
D. 8,785

AUG 1 1963

SKIRMISH ON picket line in Boston, outside Boston School Committee headquarters.
AP Wirephoto

The Racial Crisis — Driving For Vote

'I Want To Be A Citizen'

Editor's Note: In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Fourth in a specialized series of articles by The Associated Press on the racial crisis.

By RELMAN MORIN

Tuskegee, Ala. —(AP)— The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I JUST WANT to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene — with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement — is being reenacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, politically, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

THE WOMAN in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

SPEAKING OF the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Falette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Ala., had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomrey, the rate of registration, of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

STATISTICS ON 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the gee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I JUST WANT to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene — with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement — is being reenacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

SPEAKING OF the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the cam-registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Ala., had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomrey, the rate of registration, of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

STATISTICS ON 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one—many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

FOR EXAMPLE, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"Eighteen affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

SIMILARLY, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

AS NEGRO VOTING strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already — although it is difficult to say with certainty — that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

Next: The Economic Effects.

LA CROSSE, WIS.
TRIBUNE
D. 32 6 8 S. 32 528

AUG 1 1963

VOTER 'CLINICS' HELD IN SOUTH

Vote Registration Helps Negroes To Increase Political Leverage

EDITOR'S NOTE—In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Fourth in a specialized series of articles by The Associated Press on the racial crisis.

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells here where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

☆ ☆ ☆

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

☆ ☆ ☆

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

☆ ☆ ☆

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

☆ ☆ ☆

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

☆ ☆ ☆

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have ben required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simply provisions as, 'There shall be no ibprisonment for debts.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

☆ ☆ ☆

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

☆ ☆ ☆

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Asociation, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

NEXT: THE ECONOMIC EFFECTS

FOND DU LAC, WIS.
COMMONWEALTH REPORTER
D. 18,855

AUG 1 1963

Negroes Register To Vote To Get Strong

Editor's Note — In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Fourth in a specialized series of articles by the Associated Press on the racial crisis.

By REIMAN MORIN

Tuskegee, Ala., Aug. 1 —(AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being reenacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Want To Register

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

Alabama Mule

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the stareets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the department of justice and the Southern regional council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette counties, a justice department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock county, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

One-Fourth Registered

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern regional council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites —sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met ir-

THE REV. FRED C. BENNETTE, JR., instructs Atlanta Negroes how to fill out registration forms which will enable them to vote. Similar classes are held in other cities in an effort to increase Negro voting power which, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation. Seated from left are: Austin L. Hayes, Mrs. Dollie M. Shepherd and Mrs. Hattie Ward. (AP Wirephoto)

ote To Get Stronger Voice In Governmental Affairs ich, potentially, is a power-his fight against segrega-om left are: Austin L. Hayes,

. Shepherd and Mrs. Hattie
(AP Wirephoto)

regularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"Eighteen affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the house judiciary committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Barnett Comments

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report, he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

Seek 'Moderates'

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

CRISIS

Negroes Press Drive To Register Voters

Continued from Page A-1

ever, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern States, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Devices for Rejection

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these States show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a Federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

". . . 18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Robert Kennedy's Report

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the State Constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile, have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, "There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his State to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with the U. S. News & World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the Constitution of the State of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

Political Implications

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already — although it is difficult to say with certainty — that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro voters can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

Tomorrow: The economic effects.

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
. 258,167 S. 313,112
PAGE ONE
CERTIFIED
AUG 1 1963

SUMMER OF CRISIS

Negro Registration Grows

SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL

By RELMAN MORIN
Associated Press Staff Writer

This is the fifth of a series of 13 articles surveying the racial crisis.

TUSKEGEE, Ala., August 1 — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She does't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make a full citizen."

This scene — with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement — is being reenacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The women in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of 2 million new Negro voters, North and South.

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. How-

See CRISIS, Page A-6

CORTLAND, N.Y.
STANDARD
D. 10,033

AUG 1 1963

DEEPENING CRISIS IV

More Negroes Are Registering In Southern States Each Day

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citien of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against sgregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a rsidential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign I'm a mule. What's your excuse?" reads, "I'm not registered because

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Ala., had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration, of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in cerain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderat" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

Next: THE ECONOMIC EFfects

LAS VEGAS, NEV.
REVIEW-JOURNAL
D. 31,223 S. 31,825

AUG 1 1963

Negro Vote Registrations Begin to Swell

EDITOR'S NOTE — In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Fourth in a specialized series of articles by The Associated Press on the racial crisis.

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers c- vass a residential district on istration days, ringing doorbe... If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simply provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.'"

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents o Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

MACON, GA.
NEWS
D: 23,004
PAGE ONE CERTIFIED.
AUG 1 1963

Voter Registration: A Lever in the Hand of the Negro

In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. This, the fifth in a specialized series of articles by The Associated Press on the racial crisis, explores the political phase.

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. [AP] — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

★ ★ ★

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Ala., had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards meet irregularly and at widely spaced intervals. They work slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes are still waiting in line to file applications. Or they reject applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a

Continued on Page 2

Voter Registration Is Potentially Powerful Weapon for Negroes

Continued from Page 1

it involving Macon County. udge wrote in his memoran- that:

affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

* * *

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report, he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene [Bull] Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

Friday in The Macon News: The Economic Effects.

ELMIRA, N.Y.
STAR-GAZETTE AND ADVERTISER
D. 43,791

AUG 1 1963

Southern Negroes See Voice at Polls Strong Weapon in Segregation Fight

EDITOR'S NOTE—In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro incraeses. Fifth in a specalized series of articles by The Associated Press on the racial crisis.

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

• • •

IT IS the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro

Learning How

The Rev. Fred C. Bennette Jr. shows Atlanta Negroes how to fill out registration forms which will enable them to vote. From left are Austin L. Hayes, Mrs. Dollie M. Sheperd and Mrs. Hattie Ward. (AP Wirephoto)

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

• • •

STATISTICS on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000 of whom 1,344,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced int

SIMILARLY, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simply provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications foa candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in cerain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

ed radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

• • •

ANOTHER device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000 of whom 1,344,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

istered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political im-

RACINE, WIS.
JOURNAL-TIMES
D. 33,130

AUG 1 1963

The Deepening Crisis

Voter Registration Spurring Political Strength of Negro

Editor's Note—In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. This is the fourth in a specialized series of articles by the Associated Press on the racial crisis.

By Relman Morin

TUSKEGEE, Ala. —(AP)— The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Assn. (TCA), a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make a full citizen."

This scene — with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being reenacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

Constantly Working

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Persuasion in Action

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the Courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to babysit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

Gaining Momentum

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "Voter Education Project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are segistered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparing Figures

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites — sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

". . . 18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Att. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

The Differences

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the State of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

Significance of Their Vote

There have been indications already — although it is difficult to say with certainty — that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor

egro

tention to 400
e waiting list.
testimony be-Judiciary Com-
en. Robert F.

erences nty, Negroes uired to copy long, archaic state constitu-have been resions of puncs, meanwhile l to copy such ns as, 'There risonment for

Gov. Ross Bare small num-d Negroes in er causes. In nterview with l World Re-

Negro efforts to obtain greater voting power includes demonstrations such as these—a mock wake for the 15th amendment which demonstrators say is dead in Mississippi. The open casket contains a copy of the amendment. The 'wake' was held last March on the steps of the Post Office in Atlanta. Demonstrators said they were members of the Committee on Appeal for Human Rights.

—AP Wirephoto

reasons for o voters in-apathy, and g payment of nany Negroes to vote."
qualifications
e said:
o be able to stand and inof the consti-te of Missiselieve in hav-ple elect our ing strength are the polifor a candi-office in the

Their Vote n indications gh it is difficertainty — te tipped the in elections.
of Birming-ple, say Ned T. Eugene om the city ers are not e thousands otes can be o go to the rate" views and against nning on a

"white suose election,
e difference.
Ala., Negro already outes in regis-s, theoreti-
ect a mayor

and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Assn., saying: "We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

Next: The economic effects.

THE MIAMI NEWS
MIAMI, FLA.
D. 154,397 S. 137,140

AUG 1 1963

Every Vote Means Greater Strength

By RELMAN MORIN
The Associated Press

TUSKEGEE, Ala. — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization in Tuskegee, Ala., they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene — with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement — is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

Special Report

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly - repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse

NEGROES HOLD MOCK WAKE FOR THE 15TH AMENDMENT
A Demonstration To Obtain Greater Voting Power

The DEEPENING CRISIS

● The Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Fifth in a specialized series of articles on the racial crisis.

in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a law suit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

". . . 18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

BOBBY TELLS HOUSE

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Attorney General Robert Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required

There have been indications already — — although it is difficult to say with certainty — that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

NEXT: The Economic Effects

against segregation.

Special Report

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly - repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

ATTEMPT TO PERSUADE

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

A BISHOP'S VIEWS

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South.

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

FIGURES NOT COMPLETE

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Ala., had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 a month, he said.

11 SOUTHERN STATES

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites — sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

THEY WORK SLOWLY

Registration boards met irregularly at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting wrote in his memorandum that:

" . . . 18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

BOBBY TELLS HOUSE

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Attorney General Robert Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile, have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report, he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the State of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

WHAT ARE IMPLICATIONS?

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

the difference.

In Tuskegee, Negro leaders sa outnumber the whites in registere theoretically, they could elect a entire city government. But Willi executive secretary of the Tuskegee tion, says:

"We would discourage an all-N don't want Negro domination preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for th man."

NEXT: The Economic Ef

BURLINGTON, N.C.
TIMES-NEWS
D: 19,651

AUG 1 1963

The Deepeni

Negroes Work To Get Vote

EDITOR'S NOTE—In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Fourth in a specialized series of articles by The Associated Press on the racial crisis.

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells here where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentialy, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many chennels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in Voter Registration Rolls Filled

ing of our member-al is a minimum of new Negro voters, uth."
nent is steady and gaining momentum.
results?
es for the South as not complete. Howpartment of Justice
ern Regional Coun-education project" hanges in some spe-ee's Haywood and ties, a Justice De-cial said, Negro reg-jumped from 150 to five years.

nty, Alabama, had ters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, "There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

NEXT: THE ECONOMIC EFFECTS

GREENSBORO, N.C.
RECORD
D. 31,743

AUG 1 1963

Deepening Crisis: IV

Negro Organizations Work Toward Full Vo

(EDITOR'S NOTE: In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Fourth in a specialized series of articles by the Associated Press on the racial crisis.)

BY RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala., Aug. 1 (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Assn. (TCA) a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the south today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the south, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells, If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the south as a whole are not complete. However, the department of justice and the southern regional council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

Statistics on 11 southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites — sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

". . . 18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other tervie

World
"Th fewer eracy, quirin many to vot
As crease plicati
lic off
Ther ready-say w gro v certain of Bir ple, s

ull Voter Registration

March 17, 1961, battle, a fed- ama ruled on Macon County. in his memos, more than college or ad- e rejected for , formal, tech-ard to register give priority licants on the Ross Barnett, umber of reg- his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the south?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Assn., says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

Next: The economic effects.

WAUSAU, WIS.
RECORD-HERALD
D: 18,804

AUG 1 1963

The Deepening Crisis

Growing Negro Political Effort

EDITOR'S NOTE — In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Fourth in a specialized series of articles by The Associated Press on the racial crisis.)

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells here where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

Registration Drive Gain

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Other Registry Devices

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Results Measured

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Quarter Now Enrolled

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

Rule Against Registry Bars

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simply provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

Next: The Economic Effects.

AUGUSTA, GA.
HERALD
D. 20,779

AUG 1 1963

THE DEEPENING CRISIS IV

Negroes Counting Votes for Leverage

EDITOR'S NOTE—In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the poltical leverage of the Negro increases. Fourth in a specialized series of articles by The Associated Press on the racial crisis.

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells here where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

POWERFUL WEAPON

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isnt registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And here is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "Im not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

GOAL IS HIGH

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Ala., had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration, of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

ONE IN FOUR

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

ORDER DE VERED

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

POLITICAL POWER

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

Next: The Economic Effects.

Dallas Times Herald
D. 195,987 S. 206,275

AUG 1 1963

THE DEEPENING CRISIS

Southern Negroes Hurdle Barriers to Voting Rights

(Editor's Note—In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Another in a specialized series of articles by the Associated Press on the racial crisis.)

•

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association (TCA), a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studing it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA officials finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being reenacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation

NEGRO DEVICES

Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering.

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

BARNETT'S REASONS

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U. S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the State of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segreation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man"

NEXT: The economic effects.

Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering.

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, elegible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

GAINING MOMENTUM

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341.

Statistics on 11 southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000 of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

WHITE METHODS

Especially in area where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one—many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

". . . 18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said.

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile

The Detroit News
D. 710,775 S. 913,648

AUG 1 1963

THE RACIAL CRISIS

Negro Strength Grows at South's Polls

(One of a series)

TUSKEGEE, Ala., Aug. 1. —(AP)—The Negro woman says she is 50 and wants to register to vote. She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association (TCA), a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form.

She fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order.

He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene — with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement — is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before.

As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and is gaining momentum.

What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bulleck County, Ala., had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341.

In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate, that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered.

The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet unrepresented.

In areas where Negroes outnumber the whites, sometimes by as much as five to one, many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregulary and at widely spaced intervals. They worked slowly and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation.

Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.'

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already, although it is difficult to say with certainty, that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections.

Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene Bull Conner from the city government.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy."

In a close election, this could spell the difference.

NEXT: THE ECONOMIC EFFECTS.

New York Post
D. 372,679 S. 255,557
AUG 1 1963

The Race Crisis: The Vote Is a Growing Weapon

Editor's Note—A massive vote registration campaign is steadily increasing the political leverage of the Negro. Fourth in a series by the Associated Press on the racial crisis.

By RELMAN MORIN

Tuskegee, Ala., Aug. 1 (AP)—The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Assn., a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors, but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being reenacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels. The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill. Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buldings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he has registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Continued on Page 15

Race Crisis: The Vote Is a Growing Weapon

Continued from Page 3

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. It walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of 2,000,000 new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Justice Dept. and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Dept. official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Ala., had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of regisration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

About One-Fourth on Rolls

Statistics on 11 Southern states compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites —sometimes by as much as five to one—many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly and then quit for the day while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

". . . 18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Attorney General Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitutions, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile, have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, "There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Barnett ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U. S. News and World Report, he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiterary, apathy and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the State of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

The Political Efforts

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict white supremacy. In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Assn., says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

GASTONIA, N.C.
GAZETTE
D. 24,080

AUG 1 1963

Negro Registration Campaign Is Widely-Publicized Program

(EDITOR'S NOTE: In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows the political leverage of the Negro increases. Fourth in a special series of articles by The Associated Press on the racial crisis.)

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells here where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter educatino project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simply provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

NEXT: THE ECONOMIC EFFECTS

WISCONSIN RAPIDS, WIS.
TRIBUNE
D. 9,823

AUG 1 1963

Negroes in South Urge

(EDITOR'S NOTE—With a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Fourth in a special series of articles by The Associated Press on the racial crisis.)

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

First-Time Voters

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Voter Clinics

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

Any Results?

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

Judicial Findings

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before

NEGROES LEARN REGISTRATION PROCEDURES—Rev. Fred C. Bennette Jr. instructs Atlanta Negroes how to fill out registration forms which will enable them to vote. Similar classes are held in other cities in an effort to increase Negro voting power which, potentially, is a powerful weapon in fight against segregation. Seated from left are: Austin L. Hayes, Mrs. Dollie M. Shepherd and Mrs. Hattie Ward.

Urged to Exercise Right to Vote being as yet untabulated. rable figures for the ting population in these ow 17,539,000, of whom are registered.

lly in areas where Ne- utnumber the whites— s by as much as five to any devices have been keep political power in of the whites.

ation boards met irregu- at widely-spaced inter- y worked slowly, and for the day, while Ne- re still waiting in line to cations. Or they rejected ns on technical grounds.

udicial Findings

mple, on March 17, 1961, ong legal battle, a fed- in Alabama ruled on a nvolving Macon County. wrote in his memoranants, more than half of college or advanced de- re rejected for such in- tial, formal, technical red the board to register s and to give priority o 400 applicants on the t.

, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

Political Impact

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

e Jr. instructs At- ote. Similar classes entially, is a pow- Hayes, Mrs. Dollie

GLOVERSVILLE, N.Y.
LEADER-HERALD
D. 14,453

AUG 1 1963

Registration Drives Are Increasing Po

The Deepening Crisis—4

EDITOR'S NOTE—In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Fourth in a specialized series of articles by The Associated Press on the racial crisis.

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote. She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells here where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock
Negro vo
he said.
In the rate of used to b it is abou Statistic compiled al Counci fourth of age are show a t
1,344,000
Branton,
the figur counties Compar
white vo states sh
10,566,000
Especia groes o sometime

Political Leverage of U. S. Negroes

t Epismpaign ubstan-voting within embernum of voters, dy and entum.

outh as . How-Justice
l Coun-project" me spe-

od and ice De-gro reg-
150 to
.

Bullock County, Ala., had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, th rate of registratio, of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for suc hinconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

NEXT: THE ECONOMIC EFfects

MADISON, WIS.
CAPITAL TIMES
D. 45,345

AUG 1 1963

Vote Key Negro Weapon

[The Negro is enuthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote resistration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Fourth in a specialized series of articles by the Associated Press on the racial crisis.—EDITOR'S NOTE].

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP)—The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote. She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it. In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, she is given a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

Morin

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

* * *

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

* * *

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, then and there.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering. In Tuskegee alone, durnig the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign wound be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered

* * *

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites — sometimes by as much as five to one—many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, then quit for the day, while Negroes still were waiting to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

". . . 18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

* * *

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simply provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

* * *

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understanding and interpret a section of the constitution of the State of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

NEXT: The Economic Effects.

The Evening Press
BINGHAMTON, NEW YORK
D. 77,053 S. 75,106

AUG 1 1963

THE DEEPENING CRISIS (5)

Negro Vote Powerful Political Lever

EDITOR'S NOTE: This is the fifth in a series of articles on the problems of the Negro.

By RELMAN MORIN
Associated Press Writer

Tuskegee, Ala.—The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association (TCA), a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

★ ★ ★

A REPORTER questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make a full citizen."

This scene — with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being reenacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

★ ★ ★

THE DRIVE MOVES through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

★ ★ ★

ANOTHER DEVICE is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show wouldbe applicants the technicalities of registering, how to fill out correctly the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

—Associated Press WIREPHOTO.

NEGROES LEARN REGISTRATION PROCEDURES—The Rev. Fred C. Bennette, Jr., instructs Atlanta Negroes how to fill out registration forms which will enable them to vote. Similar classes are held in other cities in an effort to increase Negro voting power. Seated are: Mrs. Dollie M. Shepherd, left, and Mrs. Hattie Ward.

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of 2,000,000 new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

★ ★ ★

EXACT FIGURES for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "Voter Education Project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette counties, a justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 a month, he said.

Statistics on 11 southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties as yet being untabulated.

★ ★ ★

COMPARABLE FIGURES for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites —sometimes by as much as five to one—many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

". . .18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

★ ★ ★

HE ORDERED THE board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constituition, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simply provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U. S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

★ ★ ★

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the Constitution of the State of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty —that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bill) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

★ ★ ★

IN ANY CASE, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

NEXT: The economic effects.

LONG ISLAND CITY, N.Y.
STAR-JOURNAL
D. 95,884

AUG 1 1963

The Deepening Crisis

The Political Effects

In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases.

Fifth in a specialized series of articles by the Assocated Press on the racial crisis.

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association (TCA), a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make a full citizen."

* * *

THIS SCENE — with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being reenacted in hundreds of cities in the south today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the south, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately: If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro come in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

* * *

ANOTHER device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such

Rev. Fred C. Bennette, Jr. (right), instructs Atlanta, Ga., Negroes how to fill out registration forms which will enable them to vote. Similar classes are held in other cities in an effort to increase Negro voting power, which potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation. Seated from left are: Austin L. Hayes, Mrs. Dollie M. Shepherd and Mrs. Hattie Ward.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simply provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Governor Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U. S. News and World Report, he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

* * *

AS TO LITERACY qualification, this could spell the difference.

IN TUSKEGEE, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

TOMORROW: The economic effects.

structors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, north and south."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum.

* * *

WHAT ARE the results?

Exact figures for the south as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the southern regional council's "voter education project" pinpoints the changes in some specific areas.

the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

* * *

ESPECIALLY in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one—many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Tlabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

". . . 18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

clude illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

AS TO LITERACY qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the south?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close elec-

Negro efforts to obtain greater voting power include demonstrations such as this — a mock wake for the 15th Amendment which demonstrators say is dead in Mississippi. Open casket contains a copy of the Amendment. The "wake" was held in March 1963 on the steps of the postoffice in Atlanta, Ga., by demonstrators who said they were members of the Committee on Appeal for Human Rights.

DURHAM, N.C.
SUN
D. 25,276

AUG 1 1963

Racial Crisis: 4

Political Leverage Is Increasing As Negroes Add To Vote Rolls In South

(Fourth In A Series)
By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report, he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

Next: The Economic Effects.

WALLACE DEFENDS THE OLD ORDER—Surrounded by state policemen, Gov. George Wallace of Alabama stands in the doorway of the University of Alabama in an effort to prevent Negro registration at the school. The stand Wallace took typifies the segment of the White South that seeks to maintain the old order.
—AP Wirephoto.

BELOIT, WIS.
NEWS
D. 21,385

AUG 1 1963

Deepening Crisis IV

Negroes Turn to Polls For Civil Rights Lever

(Fourth in a series of articles)

By Relman Morin

Tuskegee, Ala.—(AP)—The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it

In the offices of the Tuskegee civic association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

Immense Potential

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement — is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

Mass Persuasion

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to babysit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Hold 'Voter Clinics'

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Failed on Punctuation

Similarly, in testimony before the house judiciary committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U. S. News and World Report, he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

Avoids 'Ignorant Voters'

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—althought it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

All-Negro Slate Possible

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict

The Rev. Fred C. Bennette, Jr., instructs Atlanta Negroes how to fill out registration forms which will enable them to vote. Similar classes are held in other cities in an effort to increase Negro voting power which, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation. Seated from left are: Austin L. Hayes, Mrs. Dollie M. Shepherd and Mrs. Hattie Ward. (AP Wirephoto) registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to babysit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Hold 'Voter Clinics'

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of 2 million new Negro voters, North and South."

Gaining Momentum

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum.

What are the results.

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the department of justice and the Southern Regional council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette counties, a justice department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock county, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 a month, he said.

One-Fourth Registered

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites — sometimes by as much as five to one—many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Worked Slowly

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon county. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal,

ple elect our officials.

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—althought it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

All-Negro Slate Possible

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

SHEBOYGAN, WIS.
PRESS
D. 27,684

AUG 1 1963

The Deepening Crisis . . . IV

Negroes Staging Massive Voter Registration Campaign In South

EDITOR'S NOTE — In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Fourth in a specialized series of articles by The Associated Press on the racial crisis.

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Through Many Channels

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

Long Legal Battle

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and inter-his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

Famous Mule

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

Registration Jumps

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been na ruled on a acon County.

his memoran-

than half of advanced defor such inal, technical rd to register give priority icants on the mony before Committee,

F. Kennedy

Negroes have by and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simply provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

Political Implications

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

NEXT: THE ECONOMIC EFFECTS

APPLETON, WIS.
POST-CRESCENT
D. 33,946 S. 33,291

AUG 1 1963

Negroes Gaining Ballot

BY RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells he where and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Fourth in a specialized series of articles by The Associated Press on the racial crisis.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Many Channels

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Municipal Buildings

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Rev. Fred C. Bennette Jr., instructs Atlanta Negroes on how to fill out registration forms which will enable them to vote. Similar classes are held in other cities in an effort to increase Negro voting power which, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation. Seated from left are, Austin L. Hayes, Mrs. Dollie M. Sheperd and Mrs. Hattie Ward. (AP Wirephoto)

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

Tennessee Counties

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

5 to 1

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Other Causes

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

Moderate Views

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

The Fayetteville Observer
NONE FINER IN CAROLINA
D. 30,559 S. 27,461

AUG 1 1963

Negro Gaining Politi

EDITOR'S NOTE—In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Fourth in a specialized series of articles by The Associated Press on the racial crisis.

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells here where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many chennels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now its about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and inter-

Political Leverage At Polls

judge wrote in his memoran-that:

affiants, more than half of had college or advanced de-
, were rejected for such inequential, formal, technical akes."

ordered the board to register Negroes and to give priority ntion to 400 applicants on the ing list.

milarly, in testimony before
House Judiciary Committee,
Gen. Robert F. Kennedy
:

n one county, Negroes have required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simply provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. oss Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

NEXT: THE ECONOMIC EFFECTS

CHARLESTON, S.C.
POST
D, 35,948

AUG 1 1963

Negroes Press Drive To

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells here where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today. It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

POWERFUL WEAPON

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's licents. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

VOTER CLINIC

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

REGISTRATION JUMPS

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

IRREGULAR MEETINGS

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The Judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simply provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett,

To Register And Vote al, formal, technical d the board to register and to give priority 400 applicants on the

in testimony before Judiciary Committee,
Robert F. Kennedy

county, Negroes have red to copy and inter-archaic sections of the itution, and then have ted for omissions of . Whites, meanwhile asked to copy such simons as, 'There shall be ment for debt.' "
pi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

POLL TAXES

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

NEXT: THE ECONOMIC EFFECTS

GALLUP, N.M.
INDEPENDENT
D 3,864 S 3,742

AUG 1 1963

Massive Vote Drive Going Among Negroes

EDITOR'S NOTE—In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Fourth in a specialized series of articles by The Associated Press on the racial crisis.

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells here where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Ala., had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line.

64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

NEXT: THE ECONOMIC EFFECTS

The Record
HACKENSACK, N. J.
D. 114,495

AUG 1 1963

The Deepening Crisis

SEEK VOTING RIGHTS: Negro efforts to obtain greater voting power include demonstrations such as this—a mock wake for the 15th Amendment, which they claim is dead in Mississippi. Open casket contains a copy of the Amendment. The burial ceremonies were conducted last march on the steps of the Post Office in Atlanta, Ga. (A. P. Wirephoto.)

Politicos Eye Negro Registration

New Voters Could Tip Poll Scales, Cause Upsets

(Fourth In A Series)

By RELMAN MORIN

Tuskegee, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A T. C. A. official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make a full citizen."

NUMBER INCREASES

This scene — with its imbama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered becaue I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter-registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber, of the African Methodist Episcopal Church says:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of 2 million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures fo rthe South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's Voter Education Project pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in 5 years.

FIGURES INCREASE

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Attorney-General Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the State Constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

BARNETT STATES CASE

Mississippi's Governor Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with "U. S. News and World Report", he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the Constitution of the State of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our date running on a program of strict white supremacy. In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire City government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

it line by line, she fills in the form. A T. C. A. official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make a full citizen."

NUMBER INCREASES

This scene — with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement — is being reenacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

USE VOTE CLINICS

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the Court House immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Another device is the voter clinic. This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such clinics.

And there is the famous Ala-

What are the results?

Exact figures fo rthe South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's Voter Education Project pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in 5 years.

FIGURES INCREASE

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the City of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about a fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an S. R. C. executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites — sometimes by as much as 5 to 1 —many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

ORDERS REGISTRATION

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes still were waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

". . . 18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes, and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

"U. S. News and World Report", he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the Constitution of the State of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already — although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the City Government. Others are not so sure.

FAVOR MODERATES

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with moderate views on segregation and against the candi-

LEARN REGISTRATION RULES: The Rev. Fred C. Bennette Jr. instructs Atlanta Negroes in how to fill out registration forms which will enable them to vote. Similar classes are held in other cities in an effort to increase Negro voting power which, potentially is a powerful weapon in the fight against segregation now being used. (A. P. Wirephoto.)

Trenton Evening Times
TRENTON, N. J.
D. 68,260
PAGE ONE CERTIFIED
AUG 1 1963

Deepening Crisis – 5

The Negro Vote: A Powerful Lever

EDITOR'S NOTE—In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Fifth in a specialized series of articles by The Associated Press on the racial crisis.

By Relman Morin

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civil Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene — with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement — is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in

(Continued on Page Two)

AP Photo

NEGROES LEARN REGISTRATION PROCEDURES: The Rev. Fred C. Bennette Jr., instructs Atlanta Negroes how to fill out registration forms which will enable them to vote. Similar classes are held in other cities in an effort to increase Negro voting power which, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The Deepening Crisis

(Continued from Page One)

municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

2 Million Goal

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Compare The Figures

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

400 On List

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simply provisions as 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U. S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

Literacy Request

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

OKLAHOMA CITY TIMES
D. 122,747

AUG 1 1963

Our Deepening Crisis—IV

Negro Voters in South Increase

EDITOR'S NOTE—In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Fourth in a specialized series of articles by the Associated Press on the racial crisis.

By Relman Morin

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association (TCA), a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

Scene Re-enacted

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement — is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the south today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Leverage Increases

Throughout the south, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly - repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Help Provided

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

'Clinics' Operate

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walk through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Goal of 2 Million

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, north and south."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Figures Not Complete

Exact figures for the south as a whole are not complete. However, the department of justice and the southern regional council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a justice department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County,, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figurre is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

A Fourth Registered

Statistics on 11 southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539-000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites — sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Negroes Left Waiting

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

" . . . 18 affiants, more than hallf of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the house judiciary committee, Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simply provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross

g Crisis—IV

ncrease Political Leverage

potentially powerful weapregation, the Negro is en-lay in a massive vote reg-number grows, the politi-ncreases. Fourth in a spey the Associated Press on such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the house judiciary committee, Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simply provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negores in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U. S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

Negroes Tip Balance?

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the south?

There have been indications already — although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene "Bull" Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

Negroes in Majority

In Tuskegee, Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

Next: the economic effects.

WASHINGTON, N.C.
NEWS
D. 5,393

AUG 1 1963

Deepening Crisis

The Political Effects

EDITOR'S NOTE—In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Fourth in a specialized series of articles by The Associated Press on the racial crisis.

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells here where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.'"

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

NEXT: THE ECONOMIC EFFECTS

MANITOWOC, WIS.
HERALD-TIMES
D. 15,666

AUG 1 1963

The Deepening Crisis—IV

Registered Negro Voter Is Potentially Powerful Weapon

(Editor's Note—In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Fourth in a specialized series of articles by The Associated Press on the racial crisis.)

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells here where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

Drive to Vote

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

'Voter Clinic'

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

Goal: Two Million

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Numbers Increase

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting populatin in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Technical Grounds

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simply provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Not Qualified

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been nidications already—although it is difficult to say with certanty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

'Moderate' Views

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

NEXT: THE ECONOMIC EFFECTS.

LEARN REGISTRATION PROCEDURES — Rev. Fred C. Bennette Jr., instructs Atlanta Negroes how to fill out registration forms which will enable them to vote. Similar classes are held in other cities in an effort to increase Negro voting power which, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation. Seated from left are: Austin L. Hayes, Mrs. Dollie M. Shepherd and Mrs. Hattie Ward. (AP Wirephoto)

PORTALES, N.M.
NEWS TRIBUNE
D. 4,173 S. 4,244

AUG 1 1963

Negroes Set Out To Prove Barnett Conclusion Wrong

EDITOR'S NOTE—In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Fourth in a specialized series of articles by The Associated Press on the racial crisis.

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men anl women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

partment official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Ala., had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority

RHINELANDER, WIS.
NEWS
D. 4,741

AUG 1 1963

The Deepening Crisis: 4

Political Effects of Integration

EDITOR'S NOTE—In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Fourth in a specialized series of articles by The Associated Press on the racial crisis.

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

Wants to Be a Citizen.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

Drive Moves in Many Ways.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's li-white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Whites Retain Power.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Robert Kennedy Testifies.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simply provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

Political Implications.

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

istration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men anl women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registerel, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice De-

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

NEXT: THE ECONOMIC EFFECTS

---

tentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

Drive Moves in Many Ways.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

The 'Alabama Mule.'

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

Increase Is Significant.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

Political Implications.

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

NEXT: The Economic Effects.

FECTS

The Hartford Times
D. 126,360

AUG 1 1963

Dixie Negroes Moving Toward the Polls

By RELMAN MORIN
(Fourth of a Series)

Tuskegee, Ala.—(AP)—The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association (TCA), a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make a full citizen."

• • •

THIS SCENE—With its immense potentialities for the Negro movement — is being reenacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave

Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites — sometimes by as much as five to one—many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

• • •

FOR EXAMPLE, on Mar. 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon county. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

". . . 18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, "there shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

• • •

AS TO LITERACY qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty — that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

• • •

IN ANY CASE, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

(Next: The Economic Effects)

registered will make a full citizen."

* * *

THIS SCENE—With its immense potentialities for the Negro movement — is being reenacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

* * *

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

* * *

ANOTHER DEVICE is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

* * *

STATISTICS on 11 Southern States, compiled by the

Newsday
GARDEN CITY, N. Y.
D. 344,789

AUG 1 1963

The Racial Time Bomb

Negro Voter-Registration Drive Grows

This is the fourth part of a series surveying the deepening integration crisis in the United States.

Tuskegee, Ala. (AP)—The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote. She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association (TCA), a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply: "I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being reenacted in hundreds of cities in the South today. It is the result of the voter-registration drive. Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels. The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill. Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads: "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said: "The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of 2,000,000 new Negro voters, North and South."

What Are the Results?

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results? Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "Voter Education Project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years. Bullock County, Ala., had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. Statistics on 11 southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one—many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites. Registration boards met irregularly and at widely spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications an technical grounds.

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South? There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says: "We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years. We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

Continued Tomorrow

Long Island Press
JAMAICA, N. Y.
D. 295,831 S. 369,281

AUG 1 1963

Press SPOTLIGHT ON The Deepening Crisis

Negroes' Big Weapon: Vote Registration Drive

With a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows the political leverage of the Negro increases. This is the fifth in a specialized series of articles on the racial crisis.

★ ★ ★

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP)—The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association (TCA), a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. It it's accepted she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make a full citizen."

This scene — with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement — is being reenacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education

Negro efforts to obtain greater voting power includes demonstrations such as this—a mock wake for the 15th Amendment which demonstrators say is dead in Mississippi. Open casket contains a copy of the amendment. The "Wake" was held in March, 1963, on the steps of the post office in Atlanta, Ga. by demonstrators who said they were members of the Committee on Appeal for Human Rights.

of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet un-involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

" . . . 18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, causes. In a copyrighted interview with U. S. news and world report, he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and

This scene — with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement — is being reenacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The women in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock, County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the City of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the White voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the Whites — sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the Whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

" . . . 18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Att. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.'"

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U. S. news and world report, he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the State of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already — although it is difficult to say with certainty — that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "White supremacy." in a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the Whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We do not want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

* * *

TOMORROW: The economic effects.

Negro efforts to obtain greater voting power includes demonstrations such as this—a mock wake for the 15th Amendment which demonstrators say is dead in Mississippi. Open casket contains a copy of the amendment. The "Wake" was held in March, 1963, on the steps of the post office in Atlanta, Ga. by demonstrators who said they were members of the Committee on Appeal for Human Rights.

Rev. Fred C. Bennette, Jr. right, instructs Atlanta, Ga. Negroes how to fill out registration forms which enable them to vote. Similar classes are held in other cities in an effort to increase Negro voting power, which potentially, is a powerfull weapon in the fight against segregation. Seated from left are Austin L. Hayes, Mrs. Dollie M. Shepherd and Mrs. Hattie Ward.

Paterson Evening News
NORTHERN JERSEY'S INDEPENDENT NEWSPAPER
D. 56,344 SAT. 53,769

AUG 1 1963

The Deepening Integration Crisis

Negroes in Massive Vote Registration Campaign

EDITOR'S NOTE — In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Fourth in a specialized series of articles by The Associated Press on the racial crisis.

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells here where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene — with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement — is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

Many Channels

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "Im not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Bishop's Views

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicates that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites — sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long egal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt'."

Governor Blames Other Causes

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U. S. News and World Report, he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are no so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

Next: The Economic Effects.

THE CINCINNATI ENQUIRER
KENTUCKY EDITION
D. 197,218 S. 284,372

AUG 2 1963

The Deepening Crisis

Negro Registration Drive Producing Election Lever

BY RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP)—The Negro woman says she is 50

(Fifth of a Series

years old and wants to register to vote.

She does'nt know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA officials finds pers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

(In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases.)

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South. It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

THE WOMAN in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks there and then.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

SPEAKING of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "Voter Education Project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1341.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered.

COMPARABLE figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be erpected to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala., Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P. Mitchell, executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

NEXT: The economic effects.

ROSWELL, N.M.
RECORD
D. 15,102 S. 15,824

AUG 2 1963

Negroes Work To Increase Voter-Registra

EDITOR'S NOTE—In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Fourth in a specialized series of articles by The Associated Press on the racial crisis.

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Ala., had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about on fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,0 1,344,000 are re Branton, an SRC the figures are in counties being as

Comparable fi white voting pop states show 17,53 10,566,000 are reg

Especially in a groes outnumber sometimes by as one — many de

Registration

our 961,
341. the oes low aid.
tes,
on-on ing res

show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

NEXT: The Economic Effects.

DAYTON DAILY NEWS
DAYTON, OHIO
D. 150,419 S. 189,580

AUG 2 1963

NOBODY, ON EITHER SIDE, IS TALKING

Albany: A Powder Keg That C

Albany, Ga., is a microcosm of the racial conflict now sweeping the country. There, in the winter of 1961, an irresistible force of massive Negro discontent met an immovable object of massive white resistance. The following article describes in depth the confrontation and the uneasy stalemate that has followed it.

BY JIM FAIN
Editor of The Daily News

Albany, Ga., is anything but a sleepy southern city. Since World War II, its population has shot upward from around 30,000 to something like 75,000. It is prosperous, rapidly industrializing.

Traditionally, Albany is a progressive island in a backward sea. All around it, the flat farmlands of Southwest Georgia stretch into a black belt as embalmed in the past as the Mississippi Delta.

FAIN in the SOUTH

Race relations in Albany (or "All-benny," as some natives call it) used to be good. There is a Negro college and a Negro elite.

From a religious point of view, the southwest Georgia city is a showcase of tolerant integration. Jews and Catholics were among its founders. There is no separate Jewish community. The idea of excluding a Jew from a country club would strike Albany's upper crust as preposterous.

SOME OF the Jews are shabby genteel—old families who lost their money but not their status to grasping Gentiles who came later. In the early days of the Junior League, Albany girls dropped plans to seek a charter when they learned Jews then were excluded.

Instead, they created a Hospital League of their own, with Jewish girls among the charter members.

Explosive Brew of Tension

Negroes were well treated by pre-World War II standards. They prospered and lived as well in Albany as anywhere in the Deep South.

YET TODAY this bustling small city is a tightly bottled, explosive brew of racial tension, frustration, suspicion, bitterness and fear.

Recently, after a brick through the windshield fractured the skull of a popular white businessman who was taking his maid home at night, the stores sold out of shotgun shells. You could not buy ammunition for a time. There is frank talk of private arming in both Negro and white communities.

At a small dinner party, late in July, the guests started home early.

"WE CAN'T use our regular sitter any more," one apolohat Could Blow at Any Moment ilies who tiles who bany girls Jews then own, with tandards.

ere in the ottled, ex-bitterness

tured the his maid
You could of private s started

ne apolo-

"Everybody's just sitting there (in Albany) hoping it won't explode before the courts can change it."—A reporter for the Atlanta Journal.

"The much-debated Albany Movement . . . ended in the first real failure Negroes have had since Montgomery."—Louis Lomax in "The Negro Revolt."

"If there ever has been a person who's tried desperately for a solution, I suppose I'm that person. But every time you think you've found a solution, they turn around and hit you with something else."—Asa D. Kelley Jr., mayor of Albany.

"We will desegregate this city, even if there must be bloodshed. Not that we will actively take arms, but we will defend ourselves."—Slater King, president of the Albany Movement.

gized. "We would have to drive her home. Instead, we let the maid stay on. Her husband comes and gets her. But she won't stay past 11 o'clock."

"We're letting our oldest sit tonight," another wife explained. "It's a first for him—but you know how it is."

You don't know how it is when you first get to Albany. It seems unreal. But you quickly find out.

For a sociological explanation of this embattled state of affairs, listen to Leslie W. Dunbar, executive director of the Southern Regional Council, a research and educational institution in the field of Southern race relations:

YOU HAVE in Albany on the one hand, says Dunbar, "Negro determination and willingness to act; and, on the other, the willful or inert resistance of white persons and their institutions.

"The methods used are . . . peaceful though firm Negro protest and firm, relatively quiet police suppression."

How did a giant confrontation of the Negro revolt and white resistance happen to take place in this progressive little city? Why did Albany suddenly flare into a familiar dateline in Algiers and Bombay, an editorial in Pravda? Why were 1,000 Negroes arrested for singing and praying on its streets?

THE ANSWERS vary according to the person you ask.

Before we hear them, let's look at some of the principal characters.

First, meet Slater King, tall 37-year-old Negro with a thin

Turn to ALBANY, Page 20, Col. 1

Albany: A Bottle Of Explosive Brew

Continued from Page 1

mustache. He is a real estate man, the son of a postal employe who long led Albany's conservative chapter of the NAACP.

Between White and Black—A Gray

King is militant and bitter, though he mellows a bit as you talk. He recalls being kicked and called "Little Nig" by whites when he worked at his first job, as a child, for the Big Star grocery.

Next, here is James D. Gray, blond, tanned, curly-haired newspaper publisher of middle age. He is a staunch segregationist. His paper editorializes consistently along racist lines.

INTERESTINGLY, the personable Gray is a New Englander, born in Massachusetts, educated at Dartmouth. He came South after World War II, bought the Albany Herald and quickly began to "out-Southern" the Southerners. He was one of the first newspaper editors in Georgia to back the segregationist Talmadges, father and son.

Then, meet Asa D. Kelley Jr., the mayor, a thin, slightly stooped young man with horn-rimmed glasses. He looks something like a professor and carries plenty of emotional scars from this racial battle. He has often been in the middle.

During World War II, Kelley fought ashore as a Marine in some rugged Pacific landings. When I first knew him, he was a teen-aged leader in my father's church in Albany. Later he was converted to the Catholic faith. My father, who took his Protestanism very seriously, always regarded this not just as a mistake but as something of a reflection on his ministry.

NOW, gentlemen, why Albany?

Slater King, a founder and now president of the Albany Movement, pins much of the blame on Gray.

"We thought of him," says King, "as one of our biggest enemies, a man who epitomized the evils of segregation. It was just a vitriolic attitude this man had toward Negroes."

The Heart of the Black Belt

When a group of Negro ministers back in early 1961 petitioned for redress of grievances, says King, Gray published an editorial condemning them, giving their names and addresses. They were deluged with abuse as a consequence.

Anr what does Gray say? He insists that outside agitators caused the whole thing.

"IT WAS all rigged from the beginning," he assures you. "They sent Anderson (Dr. W. G. Anderson, an osteopath who originally led the Movement) here two years ahead of time to set it up. It was all planned."

Now Kelley:

"I think perhaps Albany was selected because it is in the heart of a black belt, has three military installations and a Negro college. It also had a reputation for liberality.

"THEN DON'T forget that Congressman Dawson, the Illinois Negro leader, was born here.

Actually, there probably was a fair-sized chunk of chance in the beginnings of the Albany trouble.

Some of the students at Albany State College began to get restless after the lunch-counter demonstrations elsewhere and the successful bus boycott in Montgomery.

Some Restless Leaders

About that time Charles Sherrod and Cordell Reagan, experienced leaders from the Student Nonviolent Coordinating committee (Snick), came to Albany to look things over.

Among the adult Negroes there were stirrings. The NAACP always had been extremely conservative. Some restless leaders (notably Dr. Anderson, Slater King and Marion Page) organized the Albany Movement.

THEN, in late November, a group of Snick Freedom Riders

Albany Stalemate

000, so that it could be privately operated for whites only.

Gray expects to lose money. "Oh, God, will I lose money," he exclaimed. But he is protecting the lily white nature of the community.

You see "white" and "colored" signs all over. The taxi companies carry their color brands. Even a chiropractic clinic I noticed has a sign pointing to a colored entrance in the rear.

MEANWHILE, the conventional outlets of Negro protest are tightly bottled by local laws, police and courts.

Demonstrations, public parades, even the distribution of handbills are forbidden by ordinance.

These laws are enforced by the Albany police department, now one of the best known in the South. It is a highly efficient force of 71 men, presided over by Chief Laurie Pritchett, a blond, six-foot-plus, 218-pound former varsity tackle at Auburn.

Pritchett: Albany Saviour?

Pritchett is a celebrity in the South's segregation war. One verse of "We Shall Overcome" is dedicated exclusively to him. "Don't Let Chief Pritchett Turn You 'Round," it chants. The New York Times profiled the small city police chief at considerable length.

Pritchett is a hero to the white community—moderates as well as segregationists—and a respected if hated villain to the Negroes in the Movement.

EARLY IN 1961, when informers first tipped him that trouble might be brewing, the chunky chief visited most of the other cities where demonstrations had occurred. Then he instituted a sophisticated training program.

"We instructed the men in what to expect," he says. "We gave lectures and showed films. We went over our plans to meet nonviolence with nonviolence, to curb demonstrations without having body contact.

"Then I spoke to every civic club I could get invited to. The keynote was law and order. We did not want whites to mix into the thing.

"THEY cooperated not only from Dougherty county (Albany) but from the surrounding ones."

As far as Mayor Kelley, publisher Gray or the white man in the street are concerned, Pritchett saved Albany. He jailed demonstrators the minute they showed up. He stayed off one side of a yellow frame, rundown duplex in the Negro residential quarter of Albany. You pass hideous slum shacks on the way, with dirty children bright-eyed in the yards and adults basking sleepy-eyed on the porches.

It is a scene from the Negro quarter of almost any Southern city, hot and somnolent in the July sun.

INSIDE, two Negro teen-agers slump on chairs. When you ask for someone in charge, one thumbs you to a door at the right. It is GHQ. There is a two burner oil stove with a coffee pot, a table and five chairs. Around the table sit Snick leaders, discussing tactics.

They must increase the pressure on the whites, they think. But they do not court arrest. Charles Sherrod, their leader, is in jail. So are a number of their group. Bail money is hard to find. The one lawyer in Albany who helps them, C. B. King, is buried under an avalanche of work.

What to do?

THAT DAY, they decided, a racially mixed group would just stroll through the downtown business area at noon. At first they thought of four people, then decided the police might be able to interpret this as a mass march. They toyed with the idea of two and decided, since they meant to mix it boy and girl, that this might be too direct.

Finally, they got down to three—two white youths and a local Negro girl.

It happened that I went to police headquarters for an interview with Chief Pritchett at 1 p.m. and was chatting with the desk sergeant when he took a telephone call that went, on his end of it, like this:

"WELL, there's no law against that."

Pause

"Yeah, it sure is getting worse."

Pause

"Well, just tell them if the nigger girl wants to walk with those nigger boys, it's all right.

So, I thought, the trio must have gotten away with their stroll.

'The Snick Kids Went Home'

Later that afternoon I learned I was mistaken, that the two white youths, Peter deLissovoy, a curly-haired Harvard student of 20, and Phil Davis, an open-faced, thoughtful youngster of 23 from Berkeley, Calif., had been arrested. They were not charged, merely held for investigation.

Chief Pritchett said later "it was pretty much for their own protection. We released them after a few hours."

"THEN," said Pritchett, "the Snick people tied up our phone lines. They called police headquarters from a number of phone booths, then left the receivers off the hook. All our lines were out. We had to go around and find the phone booths. We know when the Snick kids went home in the early morning. After that, the trouble stopped."

How does Snick operate?

Go back to the little group in GHQ, sipping coffee and plotting strategy.

JOYCE BARRETT, a 24-year-old former social worker from Philadelphia, is pretty much the leader. She is an attractive brunette of medium height. Her hair is done up in plastic curlers, under a silk scarf. She wears a simple print dress.

When she first begins to talk, she shows little animation. The entire group around the table seem dispirited—just a trace of beatnik. But laer they warm to their subject.

When a teen-aged Negro girl comes bustling in, immediately after release from jail, there is exuberance in the greeting Miss Barrett gives her, rising to a bear hug embrace.

Minstrels With Stories to Tell

Snick is a shoestring operation, Miss Barrett says. She should know. She handles the money.

"We're supposed to get $10 a week each for subsistence money," she says, "but most of the time we don't get it. Right now, we've got 30 cents in the treasury. We live with local people; they feed us."

THE ELECTRICITY was cut off once at headquarters for lack of payment. It is now restored.

"We find we have an interesting effect on the white com-

C. B. KING
He Pleads Cases

ASA KELLEY
'Can't Get Agreement' area is a victory—we have our own integrated community."

HOW DOES the future look to Slater King?

"We will desegregate this city," he says, "even if there must be bloodshed. Not that we will actively take arms, but we will defend ourselves."

Integration to King means public facilities, jobs and education. It means Negro policemen and other city employes. It means equal opportunity in private industry.

"THIS DAMN racist Chamber of Commerce," he says, "keeps us out of jobs."

It means a Negro Federal Savings and Loan Association. It means credit unions in the churches, so that Negroes can avoid loan sharks.

"We hope to see a kind of inborn socialism among our people," he says, "similar to that among Jews. We have to set up night schools and things like that. Right now this city doesn't even have a truant officer. They want our children to stay out of school."

Small Explosions Only

King says he will get help to send bright Negro children to college, even if he has to bring tremendous pressure to bear upon wealthier Negroes.

"We plan to continue our demonstrations, our voter registration, our boycotts of downtown businesses," he says.

FROM THIS he expects no major violence. "We're going to have a lot of small explosions," he says, "but I hope general violence can be avoided. I don't think any of us gains by it."

How does Chief Pritchett see the future?

"You can't say it won't reach a boiling point and explode," he says. "But if the outsiders would stay out, we could find a working solution.

"WE'RE AWARE of the fact that a lot of weapons are being bought on both sides.

"Still we have a lot of confidence that the whites won't start anything and the Negroes can't afford to provoke it. They would lose the sympathy they are trying to gain."

Mayor Kelley is somewhere close to the chief's point of view.

"WE'RE SITTING here tonight on the biggest powder keg you've ever seen," he said. "But we've been very, very fortunate that the white people have left the policing to us.

"Albany is a great town. Nothing can stop it—if we can just avoid becoming another Cambridge, Md. So far, we have."

'There Has Not Been a Victory'

How does Martin Luther King feel?

"I suspect that sooner or later we (he means himself) will set it up. It was all planned."

Now Kelley:

"I think perhaps Albany was selected because it is in the heart of a black belt, has three military installations and a Negro college. It also had a reputation for liberality.

"THEN DON'T forget that Congressman Dawson, the Illinois Negro leader, was born here.

Actually, there probably was a fair-sized chunk of chance in the beginnings of the Albany trouble.

Some of the students at Albany State College began to get restless after the lunch-counter demonstrations elsewhere and the successful bus boycott in Montgomery.

Some Restless Leaders

About that time Charles Sherrod and Cordell Reagan, experienced leaders from the Student Nonviolent Coordinating committee (Snick), came to Albany to look things over.

Among the adult Negroes there were stirrings. The NAACP always had been extremely conservative. Some restless leaders (notably Dr. Anderson, Slater King and Marion Page) organized the Albany Movement.

THEN, in late November, a group of Snick Freedom Riders came to town on a train. Many Albany Negroes decided to meet them. The Riders were arrested after entering the white dining room.

With the arrests, the Movement launched a series a mass meetings and singing marches into downtown.

ALBANY POLICE, well alerted and trained for the demonstrations, promptly jailed some 100 demonstrators.

The fat was in the fire.

In early December of 1961, Dr. Anderson invited Martin Luther King, the hero of Montgomery, the head of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (Slick), to come in and address a mass meeting.

King Came and Went to Jail

Dr. King arrived late. He had not been well briefed. He did not expect to go to jail.

But when Dr. Anderson invited him to lead a demonstration downtown, he agreed.

HUNDREDS were quickly arrested, including Drs. King and and Anderson. The total in jail then stood at 747.

Suddenly the eyes of the world focused on Albany.

Martin Luther King announced he would spend Christmas in jail. Offers of help flowed in from civil rights leaders around the nation.

BUT A split developed in the local Negro leadership. Some of the chiefs in the Movement felt that Dr. King and especially his lieutenant, the Rev. Wyatt T. Walker, were hogging the show.

Reviewing the whole affair recently, a year and a half after it happened, Dr. King told me:

"We had the Albany situation pretty well licked. Then a little dissension developed among the Negro leadership. The white community sensed this and became completely recalcitrant."

No one seems to want to say precisely what happened.

Out of Jail Before Christmas

I asked Mayor Kelley and he replied:

"All I'm at liberty to say is that it was a battle of wits at the time—as well as a battle of everything else."

AS A result, Martin Luther King came out of jail before Christmas.

There was an agreement of sorts—not too promising a one from the Negroes' point of view. It pledged reasonable bonds for those in jail and an opening of communication between the Negro leadership and the Albany city commission.

The Negroes are convinced the latter promise was broken and was made in bad faith. Their feeling contributed to a breakdown of confidence on both sides.

DR. KING says now:

"In 30 days, they backed up altogether. They didn't keep a single promise. It turned out that the Negroes on the negotiating committee had just been fooled."

Mayor Kelley feels the same way in reverse. He says he once reached agreement with the Negroes on desegregating the local bus line, only to have the leaders return with new demands.

"You can't get agreement," he says. "Everytime you think you've found a solution, they turn around and hit you with something else."

The Lily White Swimming Pool

Today, a year and a half after the big outbreaks, there is no substantial desegregation in Albany.

Bus and train stations are ostensibly integrated but Negroes claim they are turned away except when witnesses are present. The local transit company has shut down completely. The public library was the subject of a ruckus so the city desegregated it but took out all the tables from the reading room. It has vertical integration—in Harry Golden's phrase. Anybody, black or white, can check out a book but nobody can sit and read.

PARKS are segregated. The public swimming pool recently was sold to publisher Gray, over bitter Negro protests, for $72,- Pritchett is a celebrity in the South's segregation war. One verse of "We Shall Overcome" is dedicated exclusively to him. "Don't Let Chief Pritchett Turn You 'Round," it chants. The New York Times profiled the small city police chief at considerable length.

Pritchett is a hero to the white community—moderates as well as segregationists—and a respected if hated villain to the Negroes in the Movement.

EARLY IN 1961, when informers first tipped him that trouble might be brewing, the chunky chief visited most of the other cities where demonstrations had occurred. Then he instituted a sophisticated training program.

"We instructed the men in what to expect," he says. "We gave lectures and showed films. We went over our plans to meet nonviolence with nonviolence, to curb demonstrations without having body contact.

"Then I spoke to every civic club I could get invited to. The keynote was law and order. We did not want whites to mix into the thing.

"THEY cooperated not only from Dougherty county (Albany) but from the surrounding ones."

As far as Mayor Kelley, publisher Gray or the white man in the street are concerned, Pritchett saved Albany. He jailed demonstrators the minute they showed up. He staved off violence, even when things were ugly with hundreds of people milling about.

To the Negro leadership, it is a different story.

They claim that violence is a definite weapon of the Albany police, but that it is carefully and skillfully hidden. They say they are beaten or otherwise physically abused often when arrested—always behind locked doors.

A Story of Horror

An earnest-sounding Baptist minister, round-faced, thick-set Samuel B. Wells, told me a horror story less than a week after he was released from jail in mid-July.

He marched with a small group from the Shiloh Baptist church, where many of the mass meetings are held, he said. He wanted to protest the sale of the swimming pool to Gray. With his associates, he stood in front of city hall, singing and praying.

"A POLICE captain came up and asked me 'what do you want this time?' " the 46-year-old pastor said. "He told me to leave.

"I collapsed in the nonviolent way they teach us. Two officers came to pick me up. One took me by each wrist. Then they walked up and caught me in the 'grind.' "

Even though I had heard rumors of the story in Atlanta, it took me a second to understand this pronunciation. Mr. Wells meant "groin." He claimed that the policemen lifted him by the wrists and the testicles, causing excruciating pain.

HE TOLD the officers they were hurting him and told others while he was in jail that he had been hurt, he said. He himself did not know that it was a lasting injury, he says.

"I really couldn't tell how much I was hurt until I walked for a block," says the Rev. Mr. Wells. Then he went for treatment. He now wears a truss and says he is partially incapacitated.

What does Chief Pritchett answer to this?

"SAMUEL WELLS has been arrested seven or eight times," he says, "and has never been mistreated. I talked with him the night of his last arrest and he made no complaint. I saw him again the next day. He asked for no medical help.

"After his release, I talked to the doctor who treated him and there were no bruises or marks."

Bet Your Money, Take Your Choice

The FBI is investigating. It has investigated many charges of police brutality in Albany and has made no charges against the police.

Negroes say the FBI likes to get along with local police and does not try too hard. They also claim that Albany police are masters of committing brutality without leaving evidence. A favorite technique, they say, is to put white toughs in cells with rights demonstrators, white or Negro, and turn the other way while the toughs beat the demonstrators.

PRITCHETT SAYS there has been no violence, that he welcomes investigation of the charges, that the FBI has looked into them diligently and found no foundation for them.

You bet your money and you take your choice.

This much is true: The charges are widely believed in the Negro community. They contribute to a feeling of intense Negro militancy. They fan flames that could cause an explosion.

ANOTHER volatile element is Snick, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating committee.

Snick is mainly composed of white youngsters from the north, many of them college kids who come down for the summer. They live in Negro homes in Albany, a violation of Southern custom that completely baffles the white traditionists.

Just the existence of Snick in Albany is an irritant to many whites.

Snick works closely with Slick, Dr. King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference. It is marginally financed and fairly mercurial. In Albany, it has 24 field workers.

The Plan: Stroll Downtown

Come with me on a mid-morning visit to its headquarters,

Go back to the little group in Grey, sipping coffee and plotting strategy.

JOYCE BARRETT, a 24-year-old former social worker from Philadelphia, is pretty much the leader. She is an attractive brunette of medium height. Her hair is done up in plastic curlers, under a silk scarf. She wears a simple print dress.

When she first begins to talk, she shows little animation. The entire group around the table seem dispirited—just a trace of beatnik. But laer they warm to their subject.

When a teen-aged Negro girl comes bustling in, immediately after release from jail, there is exuberance in the greeting Miss Barrett gives her, rising to a bear hug embrace.

Minstrels With Stories to Tell

Snick is a shoestring operation, Miss Barrett says. She should know. She handles the money.

"We're supposed to get $10 a week each for subsistence money," she says, "but most of the time we don't get it. Right now, we've got 30 cents in the treasury. We live with local people; they feed us."

THE ELECTRICITY was cut off once at headquarters for lack of payment. It is now restored.

"We find we have an interesting effect on the white community," says Miss Barrett, "when we assume that we have the rights we are fighting for. We're beginning to see the value of making the white community nervous."

Snick is engaged on two jobs in Albany, according to Miss Barrett. They are voter registration for Negroes and community mobilization through the Albany Movement. Canvassing through the Negro community, and a small drumfire of demonstration, serve the latter purpose, she believes.

SINCE THE local newspaper plays down racial news, Snick workers move about the Negro area, serving as modern-day minstrels for communication.

Seated or standing around the table with Miss Barrett are John Perdew, 21, of Denver, Colo.; David Pell, 20, of Jersey City, the only Negro in the group; Peter Rothstein, 17, of New York; Barbara Schwartzbaum, 21, of New York, who has just arrived; Peter deLissavoy and Phil Davis, both to be arrested within three hours.

Later that week, someone will fire four or five rifle shots into a bedroom of this duplex, where John Perdew and a Negro, James Daniel, are sleeping. Neither will be hit.

EACH OF the Snick kids can tell you an atrocity story.

Each story will be denied by the police.

'Even If There Must Be Bloodshed'

Perdew says he was slugged in the stomach by a policeman when booked.

Peter deLissavoy tells of a beating administered to two Bostonians, Robert Cover and Ralph Allen, by trusties who were placed in the cell with them. One of the trusties, he said, had a reputation as a Karate expert.

A NEGRO woman joins the group. She is Mrs. Joe Christian, the mother of a 15-year-old girl, Jo Ann Christian. Jo Ann, says Mrs. Christian, was beaten by Chief Pritchett himself.

All the stories are related in matter-of-fact tones, as if these are facts of life to be endured.

What of the future? Is it hopeless?

NOT TO Joyce.

"We are working for an open city," she says. It is going to take time. The white community refuses to negotiate. When it did negotiate, it made promises it would not keep.

"Still I think the fact that we can live here in the Negro to have a lot of small explosions," he says, "but I hope general violence can be avoided. I don't think any of us gains by it."

How does Chief Pritchett see the future?

"You can't say it won't reach a boiling point and explode," he says. "But if the outsiders would stay out, we could find a working solution.

"WE'RE AWARE of the fact that a lot of weapons are being bought on both sides.

"Still we have a lot of confidence that the whites won't start anything and the Negroes can't afford to provoke it. They would lose the sympathy they are trying to gain."

Mayor Kelley is somewhere close to the chief's point of view.

"WE'RE SITTING here tonight on the biggest powder keg you've ever seen," he said. "But we've been very, very fortunate that the white people have left the policing to us.

"Albany is a great town. Nothing can stop it—if we can just avoid becoming another Cambridge, Md. So far, we have."

'There Has Not Been a Victory'

How does Martin Luther King feel?

"I suspect that sooner or later we (he means himself) will have to go back to Albany," he says. "I don't see them giving an inch without confronting a massive, nonviolent army."

BUT DR. KING does not regard the work to date as a failure.

"If one looks at victory in terms of concrete, tangible gains, then there has not been a victory. But if one looks at Albany in terms of psychic thrust, then there has been a victory. The Negro has a new sense of dignity and purpose. The Negro there now walks straight."

Recently, the federal courts ordered Albany to desegregate its schools this fall.

Ernest Wetherbee, president of the school board, told me there is no thought of defying or circumventing the order.

"I HAVEN'T talked to the board yet," he said. "I don't know exactly what we will do. But we will obey the law."

You hear a lot about obeying the law among the white community in Albany. It is almost as if the white community hopes for legal means of getting off the hook.

Though there is a passionate hope that Goldwater may win the Republican nomination and the presidency, perhaps lessening the thrust of federal intervention in racial matters, there is a fair degree of white resignation about desegregation—if orderly means can be found.

The Name of the Game Is . . .

Before I went to Albany, I asked a seasoned Atlanta Journal reporter for his estimate of the situation.

"Everybody's just sitting there hoping it won't explode before the courts can change it," he said. "It's one of the most explosive situations in the South."

SHORTLY BEFORE leaving, I talked candidly with a prominent Albany segregationist.

"Is the name of the game, then, to hold the lid on tight until the courts order desegregation?" I asked.

"Yes, that's it," he said. "But don't quote me."

Meanwhile, Albany is a city where the whites fear to go into Negro areas at night, the Negroes fear to go into white areas at night, many people keep loaded guns by their beds and nobody on either side is talking to anybody on the other side about the problem uppermost in everybody's minds.

SUNDAY: An interview with "De Lawd."

WELLSVILLE, N.Y.
REPORTER
D: 4,559

AUG 2 1963

The Deepening Crisis (4)

Negro Vote Seen as To Tip Close Electio

EDITOR'S NOTE—In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration drive. As the number grows the political leverage of the Negro increases. Fourth in a specialized series of articles by The Associated Press on the racial crisis.

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, [illegible] South."

it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

NEXT: THE ECONOMIC EFfects

istration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Ala., had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration, of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

NEXT: THE ECONOMIC EFfects

New York World-Telegram and The Sun
D. 463,241 SAT. 175,139

AUG 2 1963

Slow Integration In South Scored

Nine years after the Supreme Court declared segregation in the public school unconstitutional, 99.6 percent of Negro pupils in 11 states of the South are still attending all-Negro schools, according to a study prepared by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith and the Southern Regional Council.

Their report states that the slow pace of desegragation is due to "fear of integration itself" and to "subterfuge" in complying with the Supreme Court ruling.

At least 379 laws have been passed by state legislatures since 1954 in attempts to avoid compliance with the ruling, says Dr. J. Kenneth Morlan, professor of sociology at Randolf-Macon Women's College, who prepared the report.

MT. CLEMENS, MICH.
MONITOR LEADER
D. 14,305

AUG 2 1963

Negroes Press For Their Voting Rights In The South

EDITOR'S NOTE—In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases.

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP)—The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to babysit.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Ala., had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one—many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.'"

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

NEXT: The economic effects.

MARQUETTE, MICH.
MINING JOURNAL
D. 15,531

AUG 3 1963

The Rev. Fred C. Bennette Jr. instructs Atlanta Negroes how to fill out registration forms which will enable them to vote. Similar classes are held in other cities in an effort to increase Negro voting power, which, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.—(AP Wirephoto.)

The Deepening Crisis (4):

Voter Registration Gives Negro Potentially Powerful Weapon

EDITOR'S NOTE Using a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Fourth in a specialized series of articles by The Associated Press on the racial crisis.

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

Famous Alabama Mule

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

Gaining Momentum

"The objectives of the campaign

cil's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

One-Fourth Registered

Bullock County, Ala., had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states groes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

Long Legal Battle

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Kennedy's Comments

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile, have been asked to copy such simple provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.'"

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report, he said:

Political Implications

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to Potentially Powerful Weapon

EDITOR'S NOTE Using a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastically taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Fourth in a specialized series of articles by The Associated Press on the racial crisis.

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

Today's Special Story

Immense Potenialities

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Through Many Channels

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

'Voter Clinic'

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

Famous Alabama Mule

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

Gaining Momentum

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

From 150 To 5,000

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

One-Fourth Registered

Bullock County, Ala., had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Delaying Tactics

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negro voters are still be no imprisonment for debt.'"

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report, he said:

Political Implications

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South?

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala., for example, say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election, this could spell the difference.

Negro efforts to obtain greater voting power include demonstrations such as these — a mock wake for the 15th Amendment, which demonstrators say is dead in Mississippi. Open casket contains a copy of the amendment. The "wake" was held on the steps of the post office in Atlanta. Demonstrators said they were members of the Committee on Appeal for Human Rights.—(AP Wirephoto.)

WHITTIER, CALIF.
NEWS
D. 16,347

AUG 3 1963

RALPH McGILL

EDITOR, ATLANTA CONSTITUTION

Racial Gulf Bridged

PERHAPS THE OLDEST and most consistently reliable source of information about the South's sociological and interracial problems is the Southern Regional Council. The Council and its predecessor, the Commission on Interracial Cooperation, have been active since 1919. In that year a group of the South's Christian leaders decided an organization was needed to encourage and make possible the exchange of ideas and the foundation of mutual trust between the two races.

Because of the great gulf between the two races, one of the many pieces of folly thereby produced was that people living in the same city almost never knew what the other wanted, needed, felt or believed. There was no bridge of communication between them. (In many areas of the South there is none now. The hasty effort to create interracial committees in cities suddenly confronted with problems is illustration of how long there has been no communication.) For more than 20 years the Southern Regional Council has provided the one central source of factual, statistical information in the tortuous advance of conscience and law in the South.

* * *

BY 1940 IT WAS apparent that the growing acuteness of the race issue required that the Commission broaden its field of operations. Prime mover was the distinguished Howard Odum, professor of sociology at the University of North Carolina. His monumental book "Southern Regions," was a secular bible to young Southerners of the 1930s, when the old cotton South obviously was dying, and they strove to know and understand the complexities and contradictions of their region. Inspiration flowed from Odum. Chapel Hill became a sort of Delphic oracle. In those years Professor Arthur Raper produced "Preface to Peasantry," "The Tragedy of Lynching," and many other articles. Professor Rupert Vance contributed "Human Factors in Cotton Culture," and "Human Geography of the South." There was then, as now, an excitement in being a participating Southerner.

Odum felt that all Southern states should be able to communicate. In 1944 the Southern Regional Council was chartered. The Commissions on Interracial Cooperation merged with it. The new board consists of some 80 Southerners. They are drawn from the major religious faiths, from both races, and 13 states are represented.

From its beginning the Southern Regional Council has been dedicated to research and to the principle that fair, open and well informed discussion and dialogue are invaluable to advancement and understanding. Southern problems are like others in that they may not be resolved unless they are known and understood and debated frankly and realistically.

Since 1944 the Council has provided consultative services to private and official agencies. It has carried on research and published its findings. (Its percentage of error has been practically nil.) It has become, and is, a clearing house for other agencies working with Southern problems.

* * *

SINCE IT DID PROVIDE honest discussion and factual information, it was attacked by all the forces of dishonesty and reaction. It was, of course, denounced as Communist inspired. It also was declared to be — as it was not — a successor to the controversial Southern Conference for Human Welfare. There was never any connection, however remote. This accusation persisted for years from Klans, White Citzens Councils, and from extremist right wing groups. It finally died away. Not it is revived as these same groups, facing the inevitability of change, again resort to trying to prove that all those who support equality before the law for all citizens are Communists or the stooges of the Communists.

But as one looks back at the long road the South has come, the Southern Regional Council, which grew out of need, emerges as one of the beacon lights that has lighted the way and made factual discussion easier. It has been, and is, exciting to be a Southerner. But luckiest of all is the young Southerner. His political and spiritual leaders, national, state and local, are on trial before him. Never before has he had so good a chance to see them for what they are — or are not . . . and to make up his mind.

The New York Times
D. 680,265 S. 1,306,418

AUG 4 1963

FOUNDATION AIDS FIGHT BY NEGROES

Taconic Fund Has Donated Million for Civil Rights

By THOMAS P. RONAN

The Taconic Foundation and its president, Stephen R. Currier, are playing a quiet but powerful role in the national fight for Negro civil rights.

The foundation, established by Mr. Currier and his wife in 1958, has contributed more than $1,000,000 in the last four years to organizations striving to obtain equal rights for Negroes.

Mr. Currier was largely responsible for the recent decision of seven predominantly Negro civil rights organizations to establish common fund-raising units to meet the additional financial burden of the great increase in civil rights activities.

Son of Painter

The 32-year-old Mr. Currier, soft-spoken, taciturn and publicity-shy, is the son of the late Richard Currier, a painter who lived for many years in Europe, and of Mrs. Elizabeth Galt Griscom Currier.

His wife is the former Audrey Bruce, daughter of David K. E. Bruce, United States Ambasador to Britain, and Mr. Bruce's former wife, Mrs. Ailsa Mellon Bruce. Mrs. Currier's mother is the daughter of the late Andrew Mellon, one-time Secretary of the Treasury.

The Curriers established the foundation because they believed that they, as possessors of wealth and the advantages that went with it, had a deep obligation to the less privileged.

Determined to put their money to the best possible use, they made a thorough study of the field of philanthropy and the work done by other foundations.

They concluded that certain areas, such as higher education, medicine, science and the arts, were already well served financially and decided to concentrate primarily on race relations, child welfare and mental health.

Studies made under the auspices of the foundation or with its financial help then convinced the Curriers that the most serious problem was that of the "deprived" Negro. Of the money they have put into the foundation from year to year, more and more has gone to help solve this problem.

Complete figures on the foundation's grants are not available, but those that are show that in 1960, $162,000 was devoted to race relations, in 1961, $260,200, and in 1962, $318,500. Already this year the foundation has committed $400,000 to this work.

The total outlay of the fund in 1960 was $347,703; in 1961, $585,477, and in 1962, $695,569.

In addition to race relations, grants have been made for youth and welfare work, for a study of youth unemployment, for mental health and urban problems, and to community and neighborhood organizations.

The Taconic Foundation also has established and supports the Potomac Institute in Washington. Its purpose is "to eliminate discrimination and advance equal opportunity for all Americans."

Of the $400,000 already committed this year for race relations work, $125,000 is going to the Southern Regional Council for its program to increase Negro voter registration in the South. The Taconic Foundation has already granted $125,000 more this project.

Approximately $100,000 is for the Potomac Institute, $80,000 for the Urban League, $25,000 for the Legal Defense and Educational Fund of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and the remaining $70,000 for what was described as "miscellaneous projects."

Mr. Currier's work with Negro civil rights organizations convinced him that greater coordination was needed in their fund-raising activities. Largely through his efforts, seven of them formed for this purpose the Council for Civil Rights Leadership and the Committee for Welfare, Education and Legal Defense.

He arranged a breakfast at the Hotel Carlyle on June 19 at which leaders of the seven organizations explained their needs to 96 corporation and foundation leaders. This meeting produced nearly $800,000 for the council.

Mr. Currier is president of the foundation and also of Currier & Co., which manages the family's business interests. Both have offices at 666 Fifth Avenue.

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
.. 258,167 S. 313,112

AUG 4 1963

A PORTRAIT OF JAMES DABBS

Where Old South and NA

By REESE CLEGHORN
Star Special Writer

MAYESVILLE, S. C.—Here in the homeland of James McBride Dabbs, writer and philosopher, plantation squire and paradox, the Old South was battered and blown but it did not all go with the wind.

You pass swamp waters blackened by acids from the gaunt cypress trees, leave a United States highway to travel by shanties and expanses of now-bare cotton fields, turn into a winding dirt road overhung by crowded pine branches and lush bushes, and come abruptly into a clearing in the wilderness.

The road arches symmetrically to and from a great white house, its distant columns obscured by veils of Spanish moss hanging from the oaks.

Close by, Negroes unload sacks of feed at an unpainted outbuilding. In the distance there is the ring of iron upon iron, as one of the plantation tenants does his own blacksmithing.

Up the front steps into a broad hall, and then into a high-ceilinged room where an intruding gas heater has replaced the open hearth, and where walls are lined with Tocqueville, Nietzsche, Lomax and Whyte, you come upon what may be the South's rarest plantation sight.

The Golden Plague

There over the mantel, under an old shotgun and a muzzle-loaded rifle, hand-hewn a hundred years ago by a master of this house, hangs a golden plaque.

It praises James McBride Dabbs for "wise and dedicated efforts to unify the American people in their quest for the democratic ideal." It is dated April 9, 1961, and it is signed by the Detroit Chapter of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

A Southern planter with NAACP laurels is somewhat rarer than a day in June, but Dabbs is rare for other reasons, too.

"He is the only man I know who can intellectualize magnolias," a friend said of him, pointing toward this big, shaggy man's special genius.

Mr. Dabbs leads one of the Nation's most important civil rights organizations, the Southern Regional Council, but it is in the realm of the mind rather than in organization work that he has found a special place. He is a sort of poet-philosopher of his region, many believe a profound one.

He writes of the South today with fervent intimacy, and yet he lives more in the past and the future than in the present. ("I admit that out here I'm not much in this world, except in the mind," he said.)

JAMES McB. DABBS

When his book "The Southern Heritage" appeared in 1958, Editor Hodding Carter of Mississippi called it "the most meaningful comment on the race situation yet made by a Southerner." It is a classic in the growing field of literature created by the South's coming to grips with itself.

His Birthplace

Though he goes to Atlanta about four times a year for Southern Regional Council business and makes occasional speeches elsewhere, he is rooted to his birthplace.

Twenty years ago he quit as chairman of the English Department at Coker College in Hartwell, S. C., and went back to the land of the McBrides and the Dabbses, where his family has lived for more than 200 years. His stately home, built by the McBrides, is within a mile of the smaller house where he lived as a child.

It is also near a Presbyterian church founded by Scotch-Irish settlers in 1745 and still attended mainly by ther descendants. Mr. Dabbs, who believes Christianity is the "central fire" in the South, is a ruling elder in his church.

With pipe in hand, he sat in his study and told of how he left university life to come home to the land.

Until 10 years ago, he worked the farm himself; he recalls spending half his time on a tractor in the fields, turning the rich soil that once made this a cotton empire. Today the thousands of acres that his family owned have been reduced to 125.

Now 67, Mr. Dabbs leaves the farm to three Negro sharecroppers. ("That word always scares my liberal friends.") Though his name appears on other mail boxes nearby, the only 12-room plantatio

Dabbs, his Char and their 18-
Richard.

He's a Writer, T

His own time i to writing. More of his articles lished in periodic pects his third b 1965.

"I am trying Southerner," he ject, "I want to s ture of the Sout
the Southerner.
can't do it —
Souths. But just Karl Barth, the ologian, said th across the Unite sensed a differen the South."

As far as Mr. cerned, it is "Viv a fact that migh in his region an his neighbors. Th who regard Mr. D tor to the Soutl ago he joined in gro rights.

(You stop not he lives, and one a hypocrite while Nobody in Soutl any attention to D

"Defending seg way of life, we short," he said wi
we live here 300
plish only this? I

"I'm defending
I'm defending it
ture rather than Barnett defended membered terror

"I would never because it has rest of the count

Southern Charac

To Mr. Dabbs, tions, the South
characteristics:

He loves the from it some sere him to be most se

He is more de and with it ne courtesy. At he creature of ma money.

He is essentiall out the harshnes

More than t or the Westerne sense of having world as a part without the neces for it.

And he senses
just as a man, de nity of treatmen
vacy of living.

"You would n dinary times, for a nd NAACP Meet ved as a byterian ch-Irish ttended

nts. Mr.
stianity
South,
ch.
sat in he left ome to worked ecalls a trac-he rich cotton nds of ed have ves the roppers.

my lib-
s name boxes

nearby, the only occupants of the 12-room plantation house are Mr. Dabbs, his Charleston-born wife, and their 18-year-old son, Richard.

He's a Writer, Too

His own time is largely devoted to writing. More than a hundred of his articles have been published in periodicals, and he expects his third book to appear in 1965.

"I am trying to corner the Southerner," he said of his subject, "I want to set forth the nature of the South, the nature of the Southerner. People say you can't do it — there are many Souths. But just a few days ago Karl Barth, the great Swiss theologian, said that in traveling across the United States he had sensed a different atmosphere in the South."

As far as Mr. Dabbs is concerned, it is "Vive la difference," a fact that might surprise many in his region and even some of his neighbors. These are the ones who regard Mr. Dabbs as a "traitor to the South" because long ago he joined in the fight for Negro rights.

(You stop not far from where he lives, and one man calls him a hypocrite while another asserts: Nobody in South Carolina pays any attention to Dabbs.")

"Defending segregation as our way of life, we sell the South short," he said with feeling. "Have we live here 300 years to accomplish only this? I don't believe it.

"I'm defending the South, but I'm defending it against the future rather than the past. Ross Barnett defended it against a remembered terror of 75 years ago.

"I would never leave the South, because it has something the rest of the country doesn't have."

Southern Characteristics

To Mr. Dabbs, granting exceptions, the Southerner has these characteristics:

He loves the land, and draws from it some serenity that enables him to be most self-contained.

He is more devoted to leisure, and with it neighborliness and courtesy. At heart he is more a creature of manners than of money.

He is essentially religious, without the harshness of the Puritan.

More than the Midwesterner or the Westerner, he possesses a sense of having a place in the world as a particular individual, without the necessity of competing for it.

And he senses having a place just as a man, deserving some dignity of treatment and some privacy of living.

"You would not expect, in ordinary times, for a Ross Barnett to be a Southerner," he said. "The narrow, hard people ought to come out of New England, where Yankee Puritans held sway. Barnett is an exception rather than a true Southerner, a creature of the imbalance that exists within our culture right now."

What is the imbalance?

It was born of conflict between the Southerner's natural desire for a peaceful, pastoral, personal life and the necessity to defend ugly institutions he knew were fundamentally wrong, Mr. Dabbs believes. First it was slavery, then segregation, that imposed the pressures bringing about distortion in the Southern character.

Gaining New Values

"I think we will have to hammer out from scratch new values for an industrial, urban society," he said. "I don't believe the country has done it yet. I would hope that somehow we can transfer to this new order some of the values of the earlier, agrarian order, to leave us a life with some dignity."

A belief in the special character of the South, he thinks, is in keeping with the aspirations of the Southern Regional Council, an organization of whites and Negroes with a 43-year history of seeking to improve race relations.

The council staff is in Atlanta, and Mr. Dabbs, who has been president since 1957, drops in only occasionally. The council's endeavors have been in the realm of research, education and maintaining interracial communications rather than in legal and direct action

Some of Mr. Dabbs friends were a bit anxious when he was called upon in 1961 to address the national convention of another civil rights organization, the NAACP, in Philadelphia. After all, enemy of segregation or not, here was a Southern traditionalist who didn't quite fit any of the usual patterns of civil rights advocates — an elderly man, a lover of the past, a planter.

"But he gave them a sort of cornpone talk that went over wonderfully," an associate recalled.

As usual, the human and folksy cornpone was interspersed with literary allusions, metaphorical flourishes, biting irony and the thunder of strong conviction, but in no shape but his own.

It was pure Dabbs, and by his own definition of the species, pure Southerner.

The happy reception of his words seemed to confirm his view that the white South and the Negro have a special affinity for each other, and that time will draw them together as brothers under the skin.

BERKELEY, CALIF.
GAZETTE
D. 14,319

AUG 5 1963

This Changing World—

'Southerner Sees Leaders on Trial'

Ralph McGill

Perhaps the oldest and most consistently reliable source of information about the South's sociological and interracial problems is the Southern Regional Council. The Council and its predecessor, the Commission on Interracial Cooperation, have been active since 1919. In that year a group of the South's Christian leaders decided an organization was needed to encourage and make possible the exchange of ideas and the foundation of mutual trust between the two races.

Because of the great gulf between the two races, one of the many pieces of folly thereby produced was that people living in the same city almost never knew what the other wanted, needed, felt or believed. There was no bridge of communication between them. (In many areas of the South there is none now. The hasty effort to create interracial committees in cities suddenly confronted with problems is illustration of how long there has been no communication.) For more than 20 years the Southern Regional Council has provided the one central source of factual, statistical information in the tortuous advance of conscience and law in the South.

BROADEN FIELD

By 1940 it was apparent that the growing acuteness of the race issue required that the Commission broaden its field of operations. Prime mover was the distinguished Howard Odum, professor of sociology at the University of North Carolina. His monumental book, "Southern Regions," was a secular Bible to young Southerners of the 1930s, when the old cotton South obviously was dying, and they strove to know and understand the complexities and contradictions of their region. Inspiration flowed from Odum. Chapel Hill became a sort of Delphic oracle. In those years Prof. Arthur Raper produced "Preface to Peasantry." "The Tragedy of Lynching" and many other articles. Prof. Rupert Vance contributed "Human Factors in Cotton Culture," and "Human Geography of the South." There was then, as now, an excitement in being a participating Southerner.

Odum felt that all Southern states should be able to communicate. In 1944 the Southern Regional Council was chartered. The Commissions on Interracial Cooperation merged with it. The new board consists of some 80 Southerners. They are drawn from the major religious faiths, from both races, and 13 states are represented.

From its beginning the Southern Regional Council has been dedicated to research and to the principle that fair, open and well informed discussion and dialogue are invaluable to advancement and understanding. Southern problems are like others in that they may not be resolved unless they are known and undertsood and debated frankly and realistically.

NO ERRORS

Since 1944 the Council has provided consultative serfvices to private and official agencies. It has carired on research and published its findings. (Its percentage of error has been practically nil.) It has become, and is, a clearing house for other agencies working with Southern problems.

Since it did provide honest discussion and factual information, it was attacked by all the forces of dishonesty and reaction. It was, of course, denounced as Communist inspired. It also was declared to be—as it was not a successor to the controversial Southern Conference for Human Welfare. There was never any connection, however remote. This accusation persisted for years from Klans, White Citizens Councils, and from extremist right wing groups. It finally died away. Now it is revived as these same groups, facing the inevitability of change, again resort to trying to prove that all those who support qeuality before the law for all citizens are Communists or the stooges of Communists.

But as one looks back at the long road the South has come, the Southern Regional Council, which grew out of need, emerges as one of the beacon lights that has lighted the way and made factual discussion easier. It has been, and is, exciting to be a Southerner. But luckiest of all is the young Southerner. His political and spiritual leaders, national, state and local, are on trial before him. Never before has he had so good a chance to see tem for what they are—or are not . . . and to make up his mind.

(Dist. 1963 by the Hall Syndicate, Inc.)
(All Rights Reserved)

The Kansas City Times
KANSAS CITY, MO.
D. 332,906

AUG 5 1963

Southern Moderates Face New Diatribes

By Ralph McGill

PERHAPS the oldest and most consistently reliable source of information about the South's sociological and interracial problems is the Southern Regional council.

The council and its predecessor, the Commission on Interracial Co-operation, have been active since 1919. In that year a group of the South's Christian leaders decided an organization was needed to encourage and make possible the exchange of ideas and the foundation of mutual trust between the two races.

Because of the great gulf between the two races, one of the many pieces of folly thereby produced was that people living in the same city almost never knew what the other group wanted, needed, felt or believed. There was no bridge of communication between them. (In many areas of the South there is none now. The hasty effort to create interracial committees in cities suddenly confronted with problems is illustration of how long there has been no communication.)

FOR MORE than 20 years the Southern Regional council has provided the one central source of factual, statistical information in the tortuous advance of conscience and law in the South. By 1940 it was apparent that the growing acuteness of the race issue required that the commission broaden its field of operations. Prime mover was the distinguished Howard Odum, professor of sociology at the University of North Carolina. His monumental book "Southern Regions," was a secular bible to young Southerners of the 1930s.

In those years Prof. Arthur Raper produced "Preface to Peasantry," "The Tragedy of Lynching," and many other articles. Prof. Rupert Vance contributed "Human Factors in Cotton Culture," and "Human Geography of the South." There was then, as now, an excitement in being a participating Southerner.

Odum felt that all Southern states should be able to communicate. In 1944 the Southern Regional council was chartered. The Commission on Interracial Co-operation merged with it. The new board consists of some 80 Southerners. They are drawn from the major religious faiths, from both races, and 13 states are represented.

FROM ITS beginning the Southern Regional Council has been dedicated to research and to the principle that fair, open and well informed discussion and dialogue are invaluable to advancement and understanding. Southern problems are like others in that they may not be resolved unless they are known and understood and debated frankly and realistically.

THE ATLANTA CONSTITUTION
For 95 Years the South's Standard Newspaper
D. 202,635
PAGE ONE CERTIFIED
AUG 5 1963

RALPH McGILL

Bridging the Dividing Gulf

Perhaps the oldest and most consistently reliable source of information about the South's sociological and interracial problems is the Southern Regional Council. The Council, and its predecessor, the Commission on Interracial Cooperation, have been active since 1919. In that year a group of the South's Christian leaders decided an organization was needed to encourage and make possible the exchange of ideas and the foundation of mutual trust between the two races.

Because of the great gulf between the two races, one of the many pieces of folly thereby produced was that people living in the same city almost never knew what the other wanted, needed, felt or believed. There was no bridge of communication between them. (In many areas of the South there is none now. The hasty effort to create interracial committees in cities suddenly confronted with problems is illustration of how long there has been no communication.) For more than 20 years the Southern Regional Council has provided the one central source of factual, statistical information in the tortuous advance of conscience and law in the South.

Field Broadened

By 1940 it was apparent that the growing acuteness of the race issue required that the Commission broaden its field of operation. Prime mover was the distinguished Howard Odum, professor of sociology at the University of North Carolina. His monumental book, "Southern Regions," was a secular bible to young Southerners of the 1930's, when the old cotton South obviously was dying, and they strove to know and understand the complexities and contradictions of their region. Inspiration flowed from Odum. Chapel Hill became a sort of Delphic oracle. In those years Professor Arthur Raper produced "Preface to Peasantry," "The Tragedy of Lynching," and many other articles. Professor Rupert duced was that people living in the same city almost never knew what the other wanted, needed, felt or believed. There was no bridge of communication between them. (In many areas of the South there is none now. The hasty effort to create interracial committees in cities suddenly confronted with problems is illustration of how long there has been no communication.) For more than 20 years the Southern Regional Council has provided the one central source of factual, statistical information in the tortuous advance of conscience and law in the South.

Field Broadened

By 1940 it was apparent that the growing acuteness of the race issue required that the Commission broaden its field of operation. Prime mover was the distinguished Howard Odum, professor of sociology at the University of North Carolina. His monumental book, "Southern Regions," was a secular bible to young Southerners of the 1930's, when the old cotton South obviously was dying, and they strove to know and understand the complexities and contradictions of their region. Inspiration flowed from Odum. Chapel Hill became a sort of Delphic oracle. In those years Professor Arthur Raper produced "Preface to Peasantry," "The Tragedy of Lynching," and many other articles. Professor Rupert Vance contributed "Human Factors in Cotton Culture" and "Human Geography of the South." There was then, as now, an excitement in being a participating Southerner.

In 1944 the Southern Regional Council was chartered. The Commission on Interracial Cooperation merged with it. The new board consists of some 80 Southerners. They are drawn from the major religious faiths, from both races, and 13 states are represented.

From its beginning the Southern Regional Council has been dedicated to research and to the principle that fair, open and well-informed discussion and dialogue are invaluable to advancement and understanding.

Council's Research

Since 1944 the Council has provided consultative services to private and official agencies. It has carried on research and published its findings. (Its percentage of error has been practically nil.) It has become, and is, a clearing house for other agencies working with Southern problems.

Since it did provide honest discussion and factual information, it was attacked by all the forces of dishonesty and reaction. It was, of course, denounced as Communist inspired. It also was declared to be—as it was not—a successor to the controversial Southern Conference for Human Welfare. There was never any connection, however remote. This accusation persisted for years from Klans, White Citizens Councils, and from extremist right wing groups. It finally died away. Now it is revived as these same groups, facing the inevitability of change, again resort to trying to prove that all those who support equality before the law for all citizens are Communists or the stooges of Communists.

But as one looks back at the long road the South has come, the Southern Regional Council, which grew out of need, emerges as one of the beacons that has lighted the way and made factual discussion easier. It has been, and is, exciting to be a Southerner. But luckiest of all is the young Southerner. His political and spiritual leaders, national, state and local, are on trial before him. Never before has he had so good a chance to see them for what they are—or are not . . . and to make up his mind.

ABILENE, TEXAS
REPORTER-NEWS
D. 36,156 S. 36,156

AUG 5 1963

Regional Council

Bridging the Dividing Gulf

(EDITOR'S NOTE: This is a syndicated column, not an editorial. The views are those of the writer, not The Reporter - News. Our opinions are expressed in our own editorials on the upper left side of this page.)

By RALPH McGILL

Perhaps the oldest and most consistently reliable source of information about the South's sociological and interracial problems is the Southern Regional Council. The Council and its predecessor, the Commission on Interracial Cooperation, have been active since 1919. In that year a group of the South's Christian leaders decided an organization was needed to encourage and make possible the exchange of ideas and the foundation of mutual trust between the two races.

McGILL

Because of the great gulf between the two races, one of the many pieces of folly thereby produced was that people living in the same city almost never knew what the other wanted, needed, felt or believed. There was no bridge of communication between them. (In many areas of the South there is none now. The hasty effort to create interracial committees in cities suddenly confronted with problems is illustration of how long there has been no communication.) For more than 20 years the Southern Regional Council has provided the one central source of factual, statistical information in the tortuous advance of conscience and law in the South.

By 1940 it was apparent that the growing acuteness of the race issue required that the Commission broaden its field of operations. Prime mover was the distinguished Howard Odum, professor of sociology at the University of North Carolina. His monumental book "Southern Regions," was a secular bible to young Southerners of the 1930s, when the old cotton South obviously was dying, and they strove to know and understand the complexities and contradictions of their region. Inspiration flowed from Odum. Chapel Hill became a sort of Delphic oracle. In those years Professor Arthur Raper produced "Preface to Peasantry," "The Tragedy of Lynching," and many other articles. Professor Rupert Vance contributed "Human Factors in Cotton Culture," and "Human Geography of the South." There was then, as now, an excitement in being a participating Southerner.

Odum felt that all Southern states should be able to communicate. In 1944 the Southern Regional Council was chartered. The Commission on Interracial Cooperation merged with it. The new board consists of some 80 Southerners. They are drawn from the major religious faiths, from both races and 13 states are represented.

From its beginning the Southern Regional Council has been dedicated to research and to the principle that fair, open and well informed discussion and dialogue are invaluable to advancement and understanding. Southern problems are like others in that they may not be resolved unless they are known and understood and debated frankly and realistically.

Since 1944 the Council has provided consultative services to private and official agencies. It has carried on research and published its findings. (Its percentage of error has been practically nil.) It has become, and is, a clearing house for other agencies working with Southern problems.

Since it did provide honest discussion and factual information, it was attacked by all the forces of dishonesty and reaction. It was, of course, denounced as Communist inspired. It also was declared to be — as it was not — a successor to the controversial Southern Conference for Human Welfare. There was never any connection, however remote. This accusation persisted for years from Klans, White Citizens Councils, and from extremist right wing groups. It finally died away. Now it is revived as these same groups facing the inevitability of change, again resort to trying to prove that all those who support equality before the law for all citizens are Communists or the stooges of Communists.

But as one looks back at the long road the South has come, the Southern Regional Council, which grew out of need, emerges as one of the beacon lights that has lighted the way and made factual discussion easier. It has been, and is, exciting to be a Southerner. But luckiest of all is the young Southerner. His political and spiritual leaders, national, state and local, are on trial before him. Never before has he had so good a chance to see them for what they are — or are not . . . and to make up his mind. —

(Distributed 1963 by The Hall Syndicate, Inc. All Rights Reserved)

LEWISTON, IDAHO
TRIBUNE
D. 17,258 S. 17,588

AUG 5 1963

Southern Regional Council Again Attacked By Racists

By RALPH MCGILL

Perhaps the oldest and most consistently reliable source of information about the South's sociological and interracial problems is the Southern Regional Council. The Council and its predecessor, the Commission on Interracial Cooperation, have been active since 1919. In that year a group of the South's Christian leaders decided an organization was needed to encourage and make possible the exchange of ideas and the foundation of mutual trust between the two races.

Ralph McGill

Because of the great gulf between the two races, one of the many pieces of folly thereby produced was that people living in the same city almost never knew what the other wanted, needed, felt or believed. There was no bridge of communication between them. (In many areas of the South there is none now. The hasty effort to create interracial committees in cities suddenly confronted with problems in illustration of how long there has been no communication.) For more than 20 years the Southern Regional Council has provided the one central source of factual, statistical information in the tortuous advance of conscience and law in the South.

By 1940 it was apparent that the growing acuteness of the race issue required that the Commission broaden its field of operations. Prime mover was the distinguished Howard Odum, professor of sociology at the University of North Carolina. His monumental book "Southern Regions," was a secular bible to young Southerners of the 1930s, when the old cotton South obviously was dying, and they strove to know and understand the complexities and contradictions of their region. Inspiration flowed from Odum. Chapel Hill became a sort of Delphic oracle. In those years Professor Arthur Raper produced "Preface to Peasantry," "The Tragedy of Lynching," and many other articles. Professor Rupert Vance contributed "Human Factors in Cotton Culture," and "Human Geography of the South." There was then, as now, an excitement in being a participating Southerner.

Odum felt that all Southern states should be able to communicate. In 1944 the Southern Regional Council was chartered. The Commissions on Interracial Cooperation merged with it. The new board consists of some 80 Southerners. They are drawn from the major religious faiths, from both races, and 13 states are represented.

From its beginning the Southern Regional Council has been dedicated to research and to the principle that fair, open and well informed discussion and dialogue are invaluable to advancement and understanding. Southern problems are like others in that they may not be resolved unless they are known and understood and debated frankly and realistically.

Since 1944 the Council has provided consultative services to private and official agencies. It has carried on research and published its findings. (Its percentage of error has been practically nil.) It has become, and is, a clearing house for other agencies working with Southern problems.

Since it did provide honest discussion and factual information, it was attacked by all the forces of dishonesty and reaction. It was, of course, denounced as Communist inspired. It also was declared to be — as it was not— a successor to the controversial Southern Conference for Human Welfare. There was never any connection, however remote. This accusation persisted for years from Klans, White Citizens Councils, and from extremist right wing groups. It finally died away. Now it is revived as these same groups, facing the inevitability of change, again resort to trying to prove that all those who support equality before the law for all citizens are Communists or the stooges of Communists.

But as one looks back at the long road the South has come, the Southern Regional Council, which grew out of need, emerges as one of the beacon lights that has lighted the way and made factual discussion easier. It has been, and is, exciting to be a Southerner. But luckiest of all is the young Southerner. His political and spiritual leaders, national, state and local, are on trial before him. Never before has he had so good a chance to see them for what they are — or are not . . . and to make up his mind.

(Copyright, 1963)

GREENSBORO, N.C.
RECORD
D. 31,743

AUG 5 1963

McGill Says:

Council Offers Reliable Word On Old South

BY RALPH McGILL

Perhaps the oldest and most consistently reliable source of information about the South's sociological and interracial problems is the Southern Regional Council. The council and its predecessor, the Commission on Interracial Cooperation, have been active since 1919. In that year a group of the South's Christian leaders decided an organization was needed to encourage and make possible the exchange of ideas and the foundation of mutual trust between the two races.

Because of the great gulf between the two races, one of the many pieces of folly thereby produced was that people living in the same city almost never knew what the other wanted, needed, felt or believed. There was no bridge of communication between them. (In many areas of the South there is none now. The hasty effort to create interracial committees in cities suddenly confronted with problems is illustration of how long there has been no communication.) For more than 20 years the Southern Regional Council has provided the one central source of factual, statistical information in the tortuous advance of conscience and law in the South.

By 1940 it was apparent the growing acuteness of the race issue required that the commission broaden its field of operations. Prime mover was the distinguished Howard Odum, professor of sociology at the University of North Carolina. His monumental book "Southern Regions," was a secular bible to young Southerners of the 1930s, when the old cotton South obviously was dying, and they strove to know and understand the complexities and contradictions of their region. Inspiration flowed from Odum. Chapel Hill became a sort of Delphic oracle. In those years Professor Arthur Raper produced "Preface to Peasantry," "The Tragedy of Lynching," and many other articles. Professor Rupert Vance contributed "Human Factors in Cotton Culture," and "Human Geography of the South." There was then, as now, an excitement in being a participating Southerner.

Odum felt that all Southern states should be able to communicate. In 1944 the Southern successor to the controversial Southern Conference for Human Welfare. There was never any connection, however remote. This accusation persisted for years from Klans, White Citizens Councils, and from extremist right wing groups. It finally died away. Now it is revived as these same groups, facing the inevitability of change, again resort to trying to prove that all those who support equality before the law for all citizens are Communists or the stooges of Communists.

But as one looks back at the long road the South has come, the Southern Regional Council, which grew out of need, emerges as one of the beacon lights that has lighted the way and made factual discussion easier. It has been, and is, exciting to be a Southerner. But luckiest of all is the young Southerner. His political and spiritual leaders, national, state and local, are on trial before him. Never before has he had so good a chance to see them for what they are—or are not . . . and to make up his mind.

ers of the 1930s, when the old cotton South obviously was dying, and they strove to know and understand the complexities and contradictions of their region. Inspiration flowed from Odum. Chapel Hill became a sort of Delphic oracle. In those years Professor Arthur Raper produced "Preface to Peasantry," "The Tragedy of Lynching," and many other articles. Professor Rupert Vance contributed "Human Factors in Cotton Culture," and "Human Geography of the South." There was then, as now, an excitement in being a participating Southerner.

Odum felt that all Southern states should be able to communicate. In 1944 the Southern Regional Council was chartered. The Commissions on Interracial Cooperation merged with it. The new board consists of some 80 Southerners. They are drawn from the major religions faiths, from both races, and 13 states are represented.

From its beginning the Southern Regional Council has been dedicated to research and to the principle that fair, open and well informed discussion and dialogue are invaluable to advancement and understanding. Southern problems are like others in that they may not be resolved unless they are known and understood and debated frankly and realistically.

Since 1944 the council has provided consultative services to private and official agencies. It has carried on research and published its findings. (Its percentage of error has been practically nil.) It has become, and is, a clearing house for other agencies working with Southern problems.

Since it did provide honest discussion and factual information, it was attacked by all the forces of dshonesty and reaction. It was, of course, denounced as Communist inspired. It also was declared to be—as it was not—a been, and is, exciting to be a Southerner. But luckiest of all is the young Southerner. His political and spiritual leaders, national, state and local, are on trial before him. Never before has he had so good a chance to see them for what they are—or are not . . . and to make up his mind.

THE NASHVILLE TENNESSEAN
D. 129,288 S. 208,237

AUG 5 1963

South's Regional Council: A Beacon in Darkness

By RALPH McGILL

ATLANTA — Perhaps the oldest and most consistently reliable source of information about the South's sociological and interracial problems is the Southern Regional Council.

The Council and its predecessor, the Commission on Interracial Cooperation, have been active since 1919. In that year a group of the South's Christian leaders decided an organization was needed to encourage and make possible the exchange of ideas and the foundation of mutual trust between the two races.

Because of the great gulf between the two races, one of the many pieces of folly thereby produced was that people living in the same city almost never knew what the other wanted, needed, felt or believed. There was no bridge of communication between them. (In many areas of the South there is none now. The hasty effort to create interracial committees in cities suddenly confronted with problems is illustration of how long there has been no communication.)

For more than 20 years the Southern Regional Council has provided the one central source of factual, statistical information in the tortuous advance of conscience and law in the South.

By 1940 it was apparent that the growing acuteness of the race issue required that the Commission broaden its field of operations. Prime mover was the distinguished Howard Odum, professor of sociology at the University of North Carolina. His monumental book "Southern Regions," was a secular bible to young Southerners of the 1930s, when the old cotton South obviously was dying, and they strove to know and understand the complexities and contradictions of their region.

Delphic Oracle

Inspiration flowed from Odum. Chapel Hill became a sort of Delphic oracle. In those years Professor Arthur Raper produced "Preface to Peasantry." "The Tragedy of Lynching," and many other articles. Professor Rupert Vance contributed "Human Factors in Cotton Culture," and "Human Geography of the South." There was then, as now, an excitment in being a participating Southerner.

Odum felt that all Southern states should be able to communicate. In 1944 the Southern Regional Council was chartered. The Commissions on Interracial Cooperation merged with it. The new board consists of some 80 Southerners. They are drawn from the major religious faiths, from both races, and 13 states are represented.

From its beginning the Southern Regional Council has been dedicated to research and to the principle that fair, open and well informed discussion dialogue are invaluable to advancement and understanding. Southern problems are like others in that they may not be resolved unless they are known and understood and debated frankly and realistically.

Clearing House

Since 1944 the Council has provided consultative services to private and official agencies. It has carried on research and published its findings. (Its percentage of error has been practically nil.) It has become, and is, a clearing house for other agencies working with Southern problems.

Since it did provide honest discussion and factual information, it was attacked by all the forces of dishonesty and reaction. It was, of course, denounced as Communist inspired. It also was declared to be—as it was not—a successor to the controversial Southern Conference for Human Welfare. There was never any connection, however remote.

This accusation persisted for years from Klans, White Citizens Councils, and from extremists right wing groups. It finally died away. Now it is revived as these same groups, facing the inevitability of change, again resort to trying to prove that all those who support equality before the law for all citizens are Communists or the stooges of Communists.

But as one looks back at the long road the South has come, the Southern Regional Council, which grew out of need, emerges as one of the beacon lights that has lighted the way and made factual discussion easier. It has been, and is, exciting to be a Southerner. But luckiest of all is the young Southerner. His political and spiritual leaders, national, state and local, are on trial before him. Never before has he had so good a chance to see them for what they are —or are not . . . and to make up his mind.

PADUCAH, KY.
SUN-DEMOCRAT
D. 29,167 S. 30,047

AUG 5 1963

McGILL

Ralph McGill Says:

Council Helps To Bridge The Gulf

Perhaps the oldest and most consistently reliable source of information about the South's sociological and interracial problems is the Southern Regional Council. The council and its predecessor, the Commission on Interracial Cooperation, have been active since 1919. In that year a group of the South's Christian leaders decided an organization was needed to encourage and make possible the exchange of ideas and the foundation of mutual trust between the two races.

Because of the great gulf between the races, one of the many pieces of folly thereby produced was that people living in the same city almost never knew what the other wanted, needed, felt or believed. There was no bridge of communication between them. (In many areas of the South there is none now. The hasty effort to create interracial committees in cities suddenly confronted with problems is illustration of how long there has been no communication.) For more than 20 years the Southern Regional Council has provided the one central source of factual, statistical information in the tortuous advance of conscience and law in the South.

By 1940 is was apparent that the growing acuteness of the race issue required that the commission broaden its field of operation. Prime mover was the distinguished Howard Odum, professor of sociology at the University of North Carolina. His monumental book, "Southern Regions," was a secular bible to young Southerners of the 1930s, when the old cotton South obviously was dying, and they strove to know and understand the complexities and contradictions of their region. Inspiration flowed from Odum. Chapel Hill became a sort of Delphic oracle. In those years Professor Arthur Raper produced "Preface to Peasantry," "The Tragedy of Lynching," and many other articles. Professor Rupert Vance contributed "Human Factors in Cotton Culture," and "Human Geography of the South." There was then, as now, an excitement on being a participating Southerner.

Odum felt that all Southern states should be able to communicate. In 1944 the Southern Regional Council was chartered. The Commission on Interracial Cooperation merged with it. The new board consists of some 80 Southerners. They are drawn from the major religious faiths, from both races, and 13 states are represented.

From its beginning the Southern Regional Council has been dedicated to research and to the principle that fair, open and well-informed discussion and dialogue are invaluable to advancement and understanding. Southern problems are like others in that they may not be resolved unless they are known and understood and debated frankly and realistically.

Since 1944 the council has provided consultative services to private and official agencies. It has carried on research and published its findings. (Its percentage of error has been practically nil.) It has become, and is, a clearing house for other agencies working with Southern problems.

Since it did provide honest discussion and factual information, it was attacked by all the forces of dishonesty and reaction. It was, of course, denounced as Communist inspired. It also was declared to be—as it was not—a successor to the controversial Southern Conference for Human Welfare. There was never any connection, however remote. This accusation persisted for years from Klans, White Citizens Councils, and from extremist right wing groups. It finally died away. Now it is revived as these same groups, facing the inevitability of change, again resort to trying to prove that all those who support equality before the law for all citizens are Communists or the stooges of Communists.

But as one looks back at the long road the South has come, the Southern Regional Council, which grew out of need, emerges as one of the beacon lights that has lighted the way and made factual discussion easier. It has been, and is, exciting to be a Southerner. But luckiest of all is the young Southerner. His political and spiritual leaders, national, state and local, are on trial before him. Never before has he had so good a chance to see them for what they are, or are not, and to make up his mind.

MACON, GA
TELEGRAPH
D. 47,067
AUG 5 1963
PAGE ONE CERTIFIED

THE GEORGIA PIPELINE

A Summer Of Racial Developments

By GENE BRITTON
1315 C&S Nat'l. Bank Bldg.
Telegraph-News Bureau.

ATLANTA — Southern Regional Council, Inc., with its headquarters in Atlanta, has issued a "synopsis" of background information on the civil rights crisis throughout the South. Dealing generally with events of the past month, the report does an excellent job of bringing the wide-ranging developments in the struggle into focus.

These are some excerpts from the Georgia section of the report:

ALBANY — July 7: Groups of Negroes and whites attempted to swim at former city pool, now privately owned and operated for whites only. Results: 12 arrests. July 8: Thirteen arrested in protest gethering at city hall. July 10: Six arrests. July 12: One white arrested for shooting at Negroes. July 13: Ten Negroes arrested for picketing home of board of education chairman. Also, early in July a Justice Department negotiator attempted to bring city commission and Negro and white business leadership together in a bi-racial committee. No offical results, but more than 40 businessmen have met unofficially with Negro leaders in recent weeks.

AMERICUS — July 12-14: Thirty-five arrested while picketing segregated movie house. July 19: At least 11 arrested after attempting to enter theater.

ATLANTA — June 25: Some 45 restaurants began desegregating, and since June 27, pickets protesting intergration have appeared sporadically at about six locations. June 27: University of Florida band cancelled reservation for 140 persons at a hotel which had declined to desegregate although there were no Negro members of the band. June 30: Attempts by Negroes to worship at First Baptist Church, morning and evening services, failed.

June 7: Attempt to enter First Baptist Church failed again. July 14: Negroes arrived early for evening service at First Baptist Church and seated themselves. Their seating area roped off by ushers when they did not leave. July 16: Mississippi Gov. Ross Barnett spoke under auspices of White Citizens' Council with pro-segregation and anti-segregation pickets outside. No incidents.

AUGUSTA — June 29: May Park desegregated as Negro and white children played baseball together without incident. July 14: Augusta newspapers editorially advocated desegregation of tax-supported facilities and equal city and county employment opportunities.

BRUNSWICK — An advisory bi-racial committee set up by the city last winter is still active.

CARROLLTON — June 27: An Episcopal priest publically urged members of his congregation to support his opposition to White Citizens' Council.

COLUMBUS — June 25: Negro ministers announced plans whereby movie theaters have agreed to desgregate in Fall, 1963. July 17: While pickets marched before Muscogee County School Board, the board announced library and school desegregation on a "timetable" beginning probably next year. July 17-19: During attempts by Negroes to use to city parks, white and Negro youths engaged in a rock battle. Five arrests. Parks and pools closed. Three separate groups of Negro leaders expressed opposition to protest demonstration.

CORDELE — July 16: City announced hiring of its first Negro policeman.

MACON — July 1: Ten establishments—including Mercer University, Wesleyan College, a grocery, a bookstore and a shopping center—signed contracts with federal government to operate the businesses where their post office stations are located on a non-discriminatory basis. [Last week's decision by the Bibb school board to refuse to approve classroom desegregation did not come within the time limits of the SRC synopsis].

SAVANNAH — Activities through July 12 included nightly demonstrations, marches, daytime picketing, smaller demonstrations and mass meetings. Violence toll: at least six wounded, arrests estimated at 240. July 1: Announcement of a school desegregation plan to begin with the 12th grade in the fall. July 10: Thirty arrested for lying down in streets protesting arrests. At least eight arrested in Savannah Beach wade-ins. July 10-11: Midnight demonstrations involving about 1,000 persons featured rock fights, tear gas, vandalism.

Some 100 state troopers sent to help keep order. July 13: Thirty-one ministers, including Roman Catholic, Episopal and Methodist bishops, call for a "just resolution" and offer their aid in bringing it about. July 16: Negro fireman shot by white youths. Six arrested. All factions of Negro leadership have called for end to violence and mass demonstrations, urged voter registration, peaceful picketing, economic pressure. Attmosphere described as "quiet, tense, expectant."

WINSTON-SALEM, N.C.
JOURNAL
D. 68,986

AUG 5 1963

Agency for Racial Communication

By Ralph McGill

ATLANTA

Perhaps the oldest and most consistently reliable source of information about the South's sociological and interracial problems is the Southern Regional Council. The Council and its predecessor, the Commission on Interracial Cooperation, have been active since 1919. In that year a group of the South's Christian leaders decided an organization was needed to encourage and make possible the exchange of ideas and the foundation of mutual trust between the two races.

Because of the great gulf between the two races, one of the many pieces of folly thereby produced was that people living in the same city almost never knew what the other wanted, needed, felt or believed. There was no bridge of communication between them. (In many areas of the South there is none now. The hasty effort to create interracial committees in cities suddenly confronted with problems is illustration of how long there has been no communication.) For more than 20 years the Southern Regional Council has provided the one central source of factual, statistical information in the tortuous advance of conscience and law in the South.

Broaden Field

By 1940 it was apparent that the growing acuteness of the race issue required that the Commission broaden its field of operations. Prime mover was the distinguished Howard Odum, professor of sociology at the University of North Carolina. His monumental book "Southern Regions," was a secular bible to young Southerners of the 1930s, when the old cotton South obviously was dying, and they strove to know and understand the complexities and contradictions of their region. Inspiration flowed from Odum. Chapel Hill became a sort of Delphic oracle. In those years Professor Arthur Raper produced "Preface to Peasantry," "The Tragedy of Lynching," and many other articles. Professor Rupert Vance contributed "Human Factors in Cotton Culture," and "Human Geography of the South." There was then, as now, an excitement in being a participating Southerner.

Odum felt that all Southern states should be able to communicate. In 1944 the Southern Regional Council was chartered. The Commission on Interracial Cooperation merged with it. The new board consists of some 80 Southerners. They are drawn from the major religious faiths, from both races, and 13 states are represented.

From its beginning the Southern Regional Council has been dedicated to research and to the principle that fair, open and well informed discussion and dialogue are invaluable to advancement and understanding. Southern problems are like others in that they may not be resolved unless they are known and understood and debated frankly and realistically.

Since 1944 the Council has provided consultative services to private and official agencies. It has carried on research and published its findings. (Its percentage of error has been practically nil.) It has become, and is, a clearing house for other agencies working with Southern problems.

Agency Attacked

Since it did provide honest discussion and factual information, it was attacked by all the forces of dishonesty and reaction. It was, of course, denounced as Communist inspired. It also was declared to be — as it was not — a successor to the controversial Southern Conference for Human Welfare. There was never any connection, however remote. This accusation persisted for years from Klans, White Citizens Councils, and from extremist right wing groups. It finally died away. Now it is revived as these same groups, facing the inevitability of change, again resort to trying to prove that all those who support equality before the law for all citizens are Communists or the stooges of Communists.

But as one looks back at the long road the South has come, the Southern Regional Council, which grew out of need, emerges as one of the beacon lights that has lighted the way and made factual discussion easier. It has been, and is, exciting to be a Southerner. But luckiest of all is the young Southerner. His political and spiritual leaders, national, state and local, are on trial before him. Never before has he had so good a chance to see them for what they are — or are not . . . and to make up his mind.

Newsday
GARDEN CITY, N. Y.
D. 344,789

AUG 5 1963

Ralph McGill: Southern Regional Council

Perhaps the oldest and most consistently reliable source of information about the South's sociological and interracial problems is the Southern Regional Council. The council and its predecessor, the Commission on Interracial Cooperation, have been active since 1919. In that year a group of the South's Christian leaders decided an organization was needed to encourage and make possible the exchange of ideas and the foundation of mutual trust between the two races. Because of the great gulf between the two races, one of the many pieces of folly thereby produced was that people living in the same city almost never knew what the other wanted, needed, felt or believed. There was no bridge of communication between them. (In many areas of the South there is none now. The hasty effort to create interracial committees in cities suddenly confronted with problems is illustration of how long there has been no communication.) For more than 20 years the Southern Regional Council has provided the one central source of factual, statistical information in the tortuous advance of conscience and law in the South.

Ralph McGill

By 1940 it was apparent that the growing acuteness of the race issue required that the commission broaden its field of operations. Prime mover was the distinguished Howard Odum, professor of sociology at the University of North Carolina. His monumental book "Southern Regions," was a secular bible to young Southerners of the 1930s, when the old cotton South obviously was dying, and they strove to know and understand the complexities and contradictions of their region. Inspiration flowed from Odum. Chapel Hill became a sort of Delphic oracle.

In those years Professor Arthur Raper produced "Preface to Peasantry," "The Tragedy of Lynching," and many other articles. Professor Rupert Vance contributed "Human Factors in Cotton Culture," and "Human Geography of the South." There was then, as now, an excitement in being a participating southerner.

Odum felt that all southern states should be able to communicate. In 1944 the Southern Regional Council was chartered. The Commissions on Interracial Cooperation merged with it. The new board consists of some 80 southerners. They are drawn from the major religious faiths, from both races, and 13 states are represented. From its beginning the Southern Regional Council has been dedicated to research and to the principle that fair, open and well-informed discussion and dialogue are invaluable to advancement and understanding. Southern problems are like others in that they may not be resolved unless they are known and understood and debated frankly and realistically.

Since 1944 the council has provided consultative services to private and official agencies. It has carried on research and published its findings. (Its percentage of error has been practically nil.) It has become, and is, a clearing house for other agencies working with southern problems.

Since it did provide honest discussion and factual information, it was attacked by all the forces of dishonesty and reaction. It was, of course, denounced as Communist inspired. It also was declared to be—as it was not—a successor to the controversial Southern Conference for Human Welfare. There was never any connection, however remote. This accusation persisted for years from Klans, White Citizens Councils, and from extremist right wing groups. It finally died away. Now it is revived as these same groups, facing the inevitability of change, again resort to trying to prove that all those who support equality before the law for all citizens are Communists or the stooges of Communists.

But as one looks back at the long road the South has come, the Southern Regional Council, which grew out of need, emerges as one of the beacon lights that has lighted the way and made factual discussion easier.

SOUTH BEND, IND.
TRIBUNE
D. 113,237 S: 117,212
AUG 6 1963

RALPH McGILL:

Southern Regional Council Spans Communications Gap

PERHAPS the oldest and most consistently reliable source of information about the South's sociological and interracial problems is the Southern Regional Council. The council and its predecessor, the Commission on Interracial Co-operation, have been active since 1919. In that year a group of the South's Christian leaders decided an organization was needed to encourage and make possible the exchange of ideas and the foundation of mutual trust between the two raees.

Because of the great gulf between the two races, one of the many pieces of folly thereby produced was that people living in the same city almost never knew what the other wanted, needed, felt or believed. There was no bridge of communication between them. (In many areas of the South there is none now. The hasty effort to create interracial committees in cities suddenly confronted with problems is illustration of how long there has been no communication.)

FOR MORE THAN 20 years the council has provided the one central source of factual, statistical information in the tortuous advance of conscience and law in the South.

By 1940 it was apparent that the growing acuteness of the race issue required that the commission broaden its field of operations. Prime mover was distinguished Howard Odum, professor of sociology at the University of North Carolina. His monumental book "Southern Regions," was a secular bible to young southerners of the 1930s, when the old cotton South obviously was dying, and they strove to know and understand the complexities asd contradictions of their region. Inspiration flowed from Odum. Chapel Hill became a sort of Delphic oracle.

IN THOSE YEARS Prof. Arthur Raper produced "Preface to Peasantry," "The Tragedy of Lynching," and many other articles. Prof. Rupert Vance contributed "Human Factors in Cotton Culture," and "Human Geography of the South." There was then, as now, an excitement in being a participating southerner.

Odum felt that all southern states should be able to communicate. In 1944 the council was chartered. The commission merged with it. The new board consists of some 80 southerners. They are drawn from the major religious faiths, from both races, and 13 states are represented.

From its beginning the council has been dedicated to research and to the principle that fair, open and well informed discussion and dialogue are invaluable to advancement and understanding. Southern problems are like others in that they may not be resolved unless they are known and understood and debated frankly and realistically.

SINCE 1944 the council has provided consultative services to private and official agencies. It has carried on research and published its findings. (Its percentage of error has been practically nil.) It has become, and is, a clearing house for other agencies working with southern problems.

Since it did provide honest discussion and factual information, it was attacked by all the forces of dishonesty and reaction. It was, of course, denounced as Communist inspired. It also was declared to be — as it was not — a successor to the controversial Southern Conference for Human Welfare. There was never any connection. This accusation persisted for years from klans, white citizens councils, and from extremist right wing groups. It finally died away.

NOW it is revived as these same groups, facing the inevitability of change, again resort to trying to prove that all those who support equality before the law for all citizens are Communists or their stooges.

But as one looks back at the long road the South has come, the council, which grew out of need, emerges as one of the beacon lights that has lighted the way and made factual discussion easier. It has been, and is, exciting to be a southerner. But luckiest of all is the young southerner. His political and spiritual leaders, national, state and local, are on trial before him. Never before has he had so good a chance to see them for what they are and to make up his mind.

Copyright, 1963

FORT WAYNE, IND.
JOURNAL-GAZETTE
D. 65,509 S. 96,663
AUG 7 1963

RALPH McGILL

Perhaps the oldest and most consistently reliable source of information about the South's sociological and interracial problems is the Southern Regional Council.

The Council and its predecessor, the Commission on Interracial Co-operation, have been active since 1919.

In that year a group of the South's Christian leaders decided an organization was needed to encourage and make possible the exchange of ideas and the foundation of mutual trust between the two races.

Because of the great gulf between the two races, one of the many pieces of folly thereby produced was that people living in the same city almost never knew what the other wanted, needed, felt or believed.

There was no bridge of communication between them. (In many areas of the South there is none now. The hasty effort to create interracial committees in cities suddenly confronted with problems is illustration of how long there has been no communication.)

For more than 20 years the Southern Regional Council has provided the one central source of factual, statistical information in the tortuous advance of conscience and law in the South.

ODUM WAS LEADER

By 1940 it was apparent that the growing acuteness of the race issue required that the Commission broaden its field of operations.

Prime mover was the distinguished Howard Odum, professor of sociology at the University of North Carolina.

His monumental book "Southern Regions," was a secular bible to young Southerners of the 1930s, when the old cotton South obviously was dying, and they strove to know and understand the complexities and contradictions of their region.

Inspiration flowed from Odum. Chapel Hill became a sort of Delphic oracle.

In those years Prof. Arthur Raper produced "Preface to Peasantry," "The Tragedy of Lynching," and many other articles.

Prof. Rupert Vance contributed "Human Factors in Cotton Culture," and "Human Geography of

ODUM WAS LEADER

By 1940 it was apparent that the growing acuteness of the race issue required that the Commission broaden its field of operations.

Prime mover was the distinguished Howard Odum, professor of sociology at the University of North Carolina.

His monumental book "Southern Regions," was a secular bible to young Southerners of the 1930s, when the old cotton South obviously was dying, and they strove to know and understand the complexities and contradictions of their region.

Inspiration flowed from Odum. Chapel Hill became a sort of Delphic oracle.

In those years Prof. Arthur Raper produced "Preface to Peasantry," "The Tragedy of Lynching," and many other articles.

Prof. Rupert Vance contributed "Human Factors in Cotton Culture," and "Human Geography of the South." There was then, as now, an excitement in being a participating Southerner.

Odum felt that all Southern states should be able to communicate. In 1944 the Southern Regional Council was chartered. The Commissions on Interracial Cooperation merged with it. The new board consists of some 80 Southerners. They are drawn from the major religious faiths, from both races, and 13 states are represented.

From its beginning the Southern Regional Council has been dedicated to research and to the principle that fair, open and well informed discussion and dialogue are invaluable to advancement and understanding.

Southern problems are like others in that they may not be resolved unless they are known and understood and debated frankly and realistically.

Since 1944 the Council has provided consultative services to private and official agencies. It has carried on research and published its findings. (Its percentage of error has been practically nil.) It has become, and is, a clearing house for other agencies working with Southern problems.

ATTACKED BY REACTION

Since it did provide honest discussion and factual information, it was attacked by all the forces of dishonesty and reaction. It was, of course, denounced as Communist inspired.

It also was declared to be — as it was not — a successor to the controversial Southern Conference for Human Welfare. There was never any connection, however remote.

This accusation persisted for years from Klans, White Citizens Councils, and from extremist right wing groups. It finally died away.

Now it is revived as these same groups, facing the inevitability of change, again resort to trying to prove that all those who support equality before the law for all citizens are Communists or the stooges of Communists.

But as one looks back at the long road the South has come, the Southern Regional Council, which grew out of need, emerges as one of the beacon lights that has lighted the way and made factual discussion easier.

It has been, and is, exciting to be a Southerner. But luckiest of all is the young Southerner.

His political and spiritual leaders, national, state and local, are on trial before him. Never before has he had so good a chance to see them for what they are — or are not — and to make up his mind.

HENDERSON, KY.
GLEANER AND JOURNAL
D. 8,006 S. 8,643
AUG 8 1963

Southern Regional Council Reliable Source Of Information

Ralph McGill Takes A Look At The News

BRIDGING THE DIVIDING GULF

Perhaps the oldest and most consistently reliable source of information about the South's sociological and interracial problems is the Southern Regional Council. The Council and its predecessor, the Commission on Interracial Cooperation, have been active since 1919. In that year a group of the South's Christian leaders decided an organization was needed to encourage and make possible the exchange of ideas and the foundation of mutual trust between the two races.

Because of the great gulf between the two races, one of the many pieces of folly thereby produced was that people living in the same city almost never knew what the other wanted, needed, felt or believed. There was no bridge of communication between them. (In many areas of the South there is none now. The hasty effort to create interracial committees in cities suddenly confronted with problems is illustration of how long there has been no communication.) For more than 20 years the Southern Regional Council has provided the one central source of factual, statistical information in the tortuous advance of conscience and law in the South.

By 1940 it was apparent that the growing acuteness of the race issue required that the Commission brooaden its field of operations. Prime mover was the distinguished Howard Odum, professor of sociology at the University of North Carolina. His monumental book 'Southern Regions," was a secular bible to young Southerners of the 1930s, when the old cotton South obviously was dying, and they strove to know and understand the complexities and contradictions of their region. Inspiration flowed from Odum. Chapel Hill became a sort of Delphic oracle. In those years Professor Arthur Raper produced "Preface to Peasantry." "The Tragedy of Lynching," and many other articles. Professor Rupert Vance contributed "Human Factors in Cotton Culture," and "Human Geography of the South." There was then, as now, an excitement in being a participating Southerner.

Odum felt that all Southern states should be able to communicate. In 1944 the Southern Regional Council was chartered. The Commissions on Interracial Cooperation merged with it. The new board consists of some 80 Southerners. They are drawn from the major religious faiths, from both races, and 13 states are represented.

From its beginning the Southern Regional Council has been dedicated to research and to the principle that fair, open and well informed discussion and dialogue are invaluable to advancement and understanding. Southern problems are like others in that they may not be resolved unless they are known and understood and debated frankly and realistically.

Since 1944 the Council has provided consultative services to private and official agencies. It has carried on research and published its findings. (Its percentage of error has been practically nil. It has become, and is, a clearing house for other agencies working with Southern problems.

Since it did provide honest discussion and factual information, it was attacked by all the forces of dishonesty and reaction. It was, of course, denounced as Communist inspired, It also was declared to be—as it was not—a successor to the controversial Southern Conference for Human Welfare. There was never any connection, however remote. This accusation persisted for years from Klans, White Citizens Councils, and from extremist right wing groups. It finally died away. Now it is revived as these same groups, facing the inevitability of change, again resort to trying to prove that all those who support equality before the law for all citizens are Communists or the stooges of Communists.

But as one looks back at the long road the South has come, the Southern Regional Council, which grew out of need, emerges as one of the beacon lights that has lighted the way and made factual discussion easier. It has been, and is, exciting to be a Southerner. But luckiest of all is the young Southerner. His political and spiritual leaders, national, state and local, are on trial before him. Never before has he had so good a chance to see them for what they are —or are not. . . and to make up his mind.

THE MIAMI NEWS
MIAMI, FLA.
D. 154,397 S. 137,140

AUG 5 1963

Bridging The Dividing Gulf

By RALPH McGILL

Perhaps the oldest and most consistently reliable source of information about the South's sociological and interracial problems is the Southern Regional Council. The Council, and its predecessor, The Commission on Interracial Cooperation, have been active since 1919. In that year a group of the South's Christian leaders decided an organization was needed to encourage and make possible the exchange of ideas and the foundation of mutual trust between the two races.

McGILL

★ ★ ★

Because of the great gulf between the two races, one of the many pieces of folly thereby produced was that people living in the same city almost never knew what the other wanted, needed, felt or believed. There was no bridge of communication between them. (In many areas of the South there is none now. The hasty effort to create interracial committees in cities suddenly confronted with problems is illustration of how long there has been no communication.) For more than 20 years the Southern Regional Council has provided the one central source of factual, statistical information in the tortuous advance of conscience and law in the South.

By 1940 it was apparent that the growing acuteness of the race issue required that the Commission broaden its field of operation. Prime mover was the distinguished Howard Odum, professor of sociology at the University of North Carolina. His monumental book, "Southern Regions", was a secular bible to young Southerners of the 1930s, when the old cotton South obviously was dying, and they strove to know and understand the complexities and contradictions of their region. Inspiration flowed from Odum.

Odum felt that all southern states should be able to communicate. In 1944 the Southern Regional Council was chartered. The Commission on Interracial Cooperation merged with it. The new board consists of some 80 Southerners. They are drawn from the major religious faiths, from both races, and 13 states are represented.

Since it did provide honest discussion and factual information, it was attacked by all the forces of dishonesty and reaction. It was, of course, denounced as Communist inspired.

★ ★ ★

This accusation persisted for years from Klans, White Citizens Councils, and from extremist right wing groups. It finally died away. Now it is revived as these same groups, facing the inevitability of change, again resort to trying to prove that all those who support equality before the law for all citizens are Communists or the stooges of Communists.

It has been, and is, exciting to be a Southerner. But luckiest of all is the young Southerner. His political and spiritual leaders, national, state and local, are on trial before him.

The Home News
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
D. 44,936 S. 44,277

AUG 8 1963

Ethiopians Study U.S. Race Problem

ATLANTA (AP)—Three high officials of the Ethiopian government got a first-hand account of how Atlanta is handling its racial problems.

The delegates — Assrati Kassa, president of the Ethiopian Senate; Araza Abebe, a senator; and Tadele Yigezu, a member of the Chamber of Deputies—are on a month-long tour of the United States.

They met yesterday with Mayor Ivan Allen and officials of the Southern Regional Council, an interracial organization.

VALDOSTA, GA.
TIMES
D. 14,015

AUG 8 1963

Ethiopians Told How Atlanta Handles Problems

ATLANTA (AP) — Three high officials of the Ethiopian government got a first-hand account of how Atlanta is handling its racial problems during a visit here.

The delegates were Assrati Kassa, president of the Ethiopian Senate; Araza Abebe, a senator, and Tadele Yigezu, a member of the chamber of deputies. They are on a month-long tour of the United States and met Tuesday with Mayor Ivan Allen and officials of the Southern Regional Council, an interracial organization.

THE ATLANTA CONSTITUTION
For 95 Years the South's Standard Newspaper
D. 202,635

AUG 8 1963

3 Top Ethiopian Officials Tour City, Study Race Problem

Three top-level officials of the Ethopian government on tour in the United States have stopped off in Atlanta to learn how the city is handling its racial problems.

The one-day stop in Atlanta included a conference with Mayor Ivan Allen, a discussion with officials of the interracial Southern Regional Council and a tour of the city.

The delegates were headed by the president of the Ethiopian senate, Assrati Kassa, and included Araza Abebe, a member of the senate, and Tadele Yigezu, a member of the chamber of deputies.

The Atlanta visit is part of a month-long tour of the United States that includes stops in eight major U.S. cities and several industrial and agricultural sites.

During a Tuesday morning discussion with officials of the Atlanta-based Southern Regional Council, an interracial research organization, Kassa said he was interested to learn of "the endeavors being made toward desegregation here."

MILWAUKEE JOURNAL
D. 373,657 S. 561,118
AUG 8 1963

Ethiopian Delegation Visits Atlanta Mayor

Atlanta, Ga.—AP—Three officials of the Ethiopian government Wednesday got a first-hand account of how Atlanta is handling its racial problems.

The delegates — Assrati Kassa, president of the Ethiopian senate; Araza Abebe, a senator and Tadele Yigezu, a member of the chamber of deputies —are on a tour of the United States.

They met with Mayor Ivan Allen and officials of the Southern Regional council, an interracial organization.

EVENING JOURNAL
WILMINGTON, DELAWARE
D. 78,384
AUG 8 1963

Ethiopians Discuss Atlanta Race Picture

ATLANTA (AP) —Three high officials of the Ethiopian government got a first-hand account of how Atlanta is handling its racial problems.

The delegates — Assrati Kassa, president of the Ethiopian Senate; Araza Abebe, a senator; and Tadele Yigezu, a member of the Chamber of Deputies— are on a month-long tour of the United States.

They met yesterday with Mayor Ivan Allen and officials of the Southern Regional Council, an interracial organization.

ALBANY, GA.
HERALD
D. 27,154 S. 26,791
AUG 8 1963

GEORGIA BRIEFS

Sanders Grants Reprieve To Convicted Murderer

ATLANTA (AP)—A 60-day reprieve has been granted to J. W. Pugh who had been scheduled to die in the electric chair Aug. 22.

Gov. Carl Sanders granted the stay Wednesday after the Pardon and Parole Board said attorneys for the convicted DeKalb County murderer had filed an application for commutation to a life sentence.

ATLANTA (AP)—A Negro educator has been named to serve as intergroup relations specialist for the Atlanta regional office of the Housing and Home Finance Agency.

The appointment went to Alexander D. Gaither, a native of Knoxville, Tenn., who recently has been serving as a field representative for Hillsborough County, Fla., schools.

MARIETTA, Ga. (AP) — The Lockheed-Georgia Co. plans to roll out the first jet-powered aircraft designed strictly as a cargo plane on Aug. 22.

In announcing the unveiling, a Lockheed spokesman said Wednesday that the C151 Star Lifter was "conceived, designed and assembled in Georgia."

The plane, which has a wing span of 160 feet, will carry a commercial payload of 96,000 pounds.

ATLANTA (AP) — Merchants who sell pistols have been urged to apply for the license necessary under a new law which applies to all firearms of less than 15 inches in length.

The law, which was passed by the legislature earlier this year, went into effect July 1, but the applications for the licenses were not ready by that time.

The law requires all persons selling pistols on other than a casual basis to put up a $1,000 bond and pay an annual $25 fee.

ATLANTA (AP) — Three high officials of the Ethiopian government got a first-hand account of how Atlanta is handling its racial problems during a visit here.

The delegates were Assrat Kassa, president of the Ethiopian Senate; Araza Abebe, a senator, and Tadele Yigezu, a member of the chamber of deputies. They are on a month-long tour of the United States and met Tuesday with Mayor Ivan Allen and officials of the Southern Regional Council, an interracial organization.

ROBINS AIR FORCE BASE, Ga. (AP) — Fulton and DeKalb County school systems are going to get more than $6 million in Air Force surplus electronic equipment.

The property, according to W. E. Evans, purchasing agent for the DeKalb Board of Education, will be used by students in analyzing circuits, studying wiring and getting a great deal of practical experience.

GRAND ISLAND, NEBR.
INDEPENDENT
D. 19,365

AUG 1 0 1963

The McGill View

Bridging the Dividing Gulf

By RALPH McGILL

Perhaps the oldest and most consistently reliable source of information about the South's sociological and interracial problems is the Southern Regional Council. The Council and its predecessor, the Commission on Interracial Cooperation, have been active 1919. In that year a group of the South's Christian leaders decided an organization was needed to encourage and make possible the exchange of ideas and the foundations of mutual trust between the two races.

Because of the great gulf between the two races, one of the many pieces of folly therby produced was that people living in the same city almost never knew what the other wanted, needed, felt or believed. There was no bridge of communication between them. (In many areas of the South there is none now. The haste effort to create interriacial committees in cities suddenly confronted with problems is illustration of how long there has been no communication.) For more than 20 years the Southern Regional Council has provided the one central source of factual, statistical information in the tortuous advance of conscience and law in the South.

By 1940 it was apparent that the growing acuteness of the races issue required that the Commission broaden its field of operations. Prime mover was the distinguished Howard Odum, professor of sociology at the University of North Carolina. His monumental book "Southern Regions," was a secular Bible to young Southerners of the 1930's, when the old cotton South obviously was dying, and they strove to know and understand the complexities and contradictions of their region. Inspiration flowed from Odum. Chapel Hill became a sort of Delphic oracle. In those years Professor Arthur Raper produced "Preface to Peasantry," "The Tragedy of Lynching," and many other articles. Professor Rupert Vance contributed "Human Factors in Cotton Culture," and "Human Geography of the South." There was then, as now, an excitement in being a participating Southerner.

Odum felt that all Southern states should be able to communicate. In 1944 the Southern Regional Council was chartered. The Commissions on Interracial Cooperation merged with it. The new board consists of some 80 Southerners. They are drawn from the major religious faiths, from both races, and 13 states are represented.

From its beginning the Southern Regional Council has been dedicated to research and to the principle that fair, open and well informed discussion and dialogue are invaluable to advancement and understanding. Southern problems are like others in that they may not be resolved unless they are known and understood and debated frankly and realistically.

Since 1944 the Council has provided consultative services to private and official agencies. It has carried on research and published its findings. (Its percentage of er has been practically nil.) It had become, and is, a clearing house for other agencies working with Southern problems.

Since it did provide honest discussion and factual information, it was attacked abyal! forces of sid honesty and reaction. It was, of course, denounced as Communist inspired. It also was declared to be —as it was not — a successor to the controversial Southern Conference for Human Welfare. There was never any connection, however remote. This accusation persisted for years from Klans, White Citizens Councils, and from extremist right wing groups. It finally died away. Now it is revived as these same groups, facing the inevitability of change, again resort to trying to prove that all those who support equality before the law for all citizens are Communists or the stooges of Communists.

But as one looks back at the long road the South has come, the Southern Regional Council, which grew out of need, emerges as one of the beacon lights that has lighted the way and made factual discussion easier. It has been, and is, exciting to be a Southerner. But luckiest of all is the young Southerner. His political and spiritual leaders, national, state and local, are on trial before him. Never before has he had so good a chance to see them for what they are — or are not. . .and to make up his mind.

COLUMBUS, GA.
ENQUIRER
D. 28,742

AUG 1 0 1963

Gov. Wallace Says 'Able' Tied to Reds

MONTGOMERY, Ala. (UPI) — Gov. George Wallace said Friday he was informed a Mobile organization was led by representatives of the Southern Regional Council Inc. of Atlanta and had Communist-front ties.

Wallace said he was "disturbed by the activities of the so-called 'Able' organization in Mobile," and said the purpose of the group "in my judgment is the full integration of the schools of Mobile and Mobile County."

" 'Able is an organization led by representatives of the Southern Regional Council Inc. of Atlanta, Ga.," Wallace said. "I am informed that this organization has left wing and Communist-front organization ties."

Leslie Dunbar, executive director of the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta said "it (Able) is in no shape or form under our leadership. They are leading themselves. The only connection with Southern Regional Council was at the request of Able, we sent consultants over to talk with them and advise them about organizing."

Birmingham Post-Herald
Alabama's 'Good Morning' Newspaper
D. 95,758

AUG 1 0 1963

Wallace Attacks Group In Mobile

MONTGOMERY, Aug. 9 (UPI)—Gov. George Wallae said today he was informed a Mobile organization was led by representatives of the Southern Regional Council Inc. of Atlanta and had Communist-front ties.

The statement brought a strong reaction from the SRC in Atlanta.

Wallace said he was "disturbed by the activities of the so-called 'Able' organization in Mobile," and said the purpose of the group "in my judgment is the full integration of the schools of Mobile and Mobile County."

" 'Able is an organization led by representatives of the Southern Regional Council Inc. of Atlanta, Ga.," Wallace said. "I am informed that this organization has left wing and Communist-front organization ties."

Leslis Dunbar, executive director of the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta said "it (Able) is in no shape or form under our leadership. They are leading themselves. The only connection with Southern Regional Council was at the request of Able, we sent consultants over to talk with them and advise them about organizing.

"Able is a local group made up of local people from Mobile. Able is the same kind of organzation that Hope was in Atlanta, the women's emergency committee was in Little Rock or any number of similar groups in other places. It was formed for exactly the same purpose and that is to help assure peaceful, orderly school desegregation in Mobile."

Says Wallace 'Misinformed'

Regarding Wallace's charges concerning the SRC, Dunbar said, "Gov. Wallace is entirely misinformed about the Southern Regional Council, which has never had any connections with Communist fronts or with citizens councils or with Ku Klux Klans.

"Gov. Wallace is advising the people of Mobile to do something which he himself recklessly is not doing—that is to investigate the facts."

Wallace and State Sen. John Tyson and Rep. Mylan Engel of Mobile sponsored a statement on the organization.

"Many sincere and dedicated Mobile citizens have been misled by the true purpose of this organization," Wallace said. "I want to urge them to investigate this organization fully before they participate in its activities."

Wallace said "this organization has publicly stated its doubt of my sincerity in the matter of public schools and further, by implication, has intimated that I do not oppose violence. My record in preserving the peace and in maintaining law and order is well known."

Able stands for a group known as "Alabamians Behind Local Education," a Mobile group which has issued a public appeal to Mobilians to "unite in an all-out effort to insure peaceful public schools in the face of a Federal court order to begin desegregating Mobile public schools this Fall."

The president of the group is Mrs. Hollis J. Wiseman, wife of a physician.

The group said earlier "whatever our feelings on this issue, Mobilians must stand together again to preserve the school system for which we have worked and paid taxes."

Offers Speakers

The group has offered speakers to various local groups to discuss the desegregation problem and how it was handled in other cities.

The group claims about 500 members, all white.

The group said in a statement at Mobile "Able takes no stand on racial issues.

"Our prime concern is that our children continue to receive the finest education our state and local school systems can provide in the face of . . . desegregation," the group said.

"We are not willing for their schooling to be interrupted for any reason, nor do we wish to expose them to the violence that has corrupted the campuses of the South."

NEW YORK
Amsterdam News
W. 59,266

AUG 1 0 1963

Taconic Plays Major Role In Aiding Negro

Stephen R. Currier, quiet, 32-year-old president of the Taconic Foundation at 666 Fifth Ave., is playing a major role in the present national civil rights fight.

It was at his urging and arranging that the leaders of the seven Negro civil rights organizations, the NAACP, CORE, Urban League, NAACP Legal Defense Fund, Southern Christian Leadership Conference, Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee and the National Council of Negro Women, met at the Hotel Carlyle last June 19 and explained their financial needs to 96 foundations and corporation executives.

New Groups

Out of this meeting the major organizations launched a $1,500,000 emergency campaign and formed the new temporary Council for United Civil Rights Leadership, of which the Urban League's Whitney Young is chairman, with headquarters at 19 E. 44th St. Also formed was the Committee for Welfare, Education and Legal Defense, a tax-exempt corporation.

This meeting arranged by Currier and the Taconic Foundation, produced nearly $800,000 for the civil rights fight, a good part of it from Taconic.

In the past four years the Taconic Foundation has contributed more than $1,000,000 to organizations fighting to secure full civil rights and equal opportunity for Negroes.

Currier's family founded the foundation to help the underprivileged, and his efforts in the past few years led him to believe that an overall coordinating fund-raising was needed.

Although the Taconic has sought to avoid publicity, it was learned that through its grants it spends $162,000 to help in race relations in 1960, 260,200 in 1961, and in 1962, $318,500. Thus far in 1963 it has already committed itself to spending $400,000.

Vote Drive

Of this year's contributions, $125,000 has gone to the Southern Regional Council for its work in behalf of voter registration, and another $125,000 is planned for later this year. Another $100,000 has been given to the Patomac Institute in Washington to help eliminate discrimination.

Some $80,000 has been given to the National Urban League, $25,000 to the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund, and the remaining $70,000 to miscellaneous projects.

TULSA WORLD
D. 96,467 S. 153,360
AUG 1 1 1963

Racial Crisis Still

Race relations hit a peak at Little Rock, Ark., Central High School, above, in 1957 when troops escorted Negro children.

By RELMAN MORIN
New York

The Negro drive for full equality has reached the dimensions of a national convulsion.

It wracks the whole United States, not just the Southern states. It is breaching the invisible racial barriers of the North no less than the visible walls in the South, shattering the complacency of one region, defeating the slow-down strategy of the other.

"Something's got a-hold of me," the Negro is chanting. "We shall overcome," is his anthem.

His movement is in the streets, the courts, the halls of Congress.

It touches schools and employment practices, a seat at a lunch counter and a home in a better neighborhood, the right to vote and the right to worship in any church, the right to sit in any public park and to read a book in any public library—in short, the rights of an American citizen and access to equal opportunity.

Starting as non-violent, his campaign has engendered violence. The blood of both races has been spilled. No one can say whether more will flow, or where, or how much.

"We will advise our people not to use violence," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), at a news conference in Jackson, Miss. "The Negro can't win in a pitched battle with the whites. He's in the minority."

But can the Negro leaders control their followers, everywhere and at all times? Who, for example, speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

"How can anyone ask me to be non-violent?" said a Negro war veteran. "That's like putting me back in the line in Korea and loading my rifle with blanks."

Violence begets violence and the possibility of a white counter-reaction has been noted by many observers. "If that happens," said Hodding Carter, editor of the Greenville, Miss., Delta-Democrat, "All hell will break loose."

During the demonstrations in Birmingham last spring, a white taxi driver said to me, "If they kill any white people, I won't ask any questions. I'll just start killin'."

The hour seems late. Is it one minute to 12 now? If so, what raced the hands of the clock?

The story is soon told.

In the North, Negro demands focus mainly on jobs and housing. Negroes at right stage a "sit-in" in New York mayor's office.

After World War II, the first important federal government action in race relations came when President Truman ordered the end of segregation in the armed forces. He also asked Congress for strong civil rights legislation. It was not granted.

During President Eisenhower's second administration, Congress enacted civil rights bills in 1957 and 1960. Using these laws, the administration filed 10 suits on behalf of Negroes' voting rights in the South.

The historic year, however, in the long and anguished struggle over civil rights, was 1954. The U.S. Supreme Court struck down, as unconstitutional, the doctrine of "separate-but-equal" in public schools. Segregation had been a legal fact for 58 years, based on a decision of the Supreme Court in 1896. Now, the court ordered the schools to be desegregated "with all deliberate speed."

Negroes and their white sympathizers exulted.

But the segregationist, eying that phrase, "with all deliberate speed," saw an escape hatch. He determined to resist as long as possible. And he did.

Mob violence exploded in southern and border states.

A climactic point of this stage was Little Rock, Ark. The year was 1957. Exactly 80 years after the end of the reconstruction in the South, federal troops marched into a southern city again. They used bayonets to disperse crowds around Central High School, and they escorted Negro children into classrooms.

Elsewhere in the South, however, the barriers remained.

Oxford, Miss., and Tuscaloosa, Ala., were still to come.

At Oxford, two men died and scores were injured when a Negro, James H. Meredith, enrolled in the University of Mississippi. Again, federal troops marched, bivouacing on the campus.

At Tuscaloosa, Gov. George C. Wallace stood in the doorway of a University of Alabama building when Justice Department officials attempted to enroll two Negroes, Vivian Malone and James Hood. A few hours later, he stepped aside when federalized units of the National Guard marched onto the campus. There was no violence.

A prospective voter, below, is shown how to operate a voting machine with a drawing at a "clinic" set up in the South by Negroes.

Long before these incidents, however, the "bright-new-day" jubilance of 1954 had begun to evaporate.

Negro disappointment, as the years passed with little desegregation, turned to bitterness. "Gradualism," the policy of slowly ending segregation, and "tokenism," permitting only a handful of Negro children in schools, offices or factories, became fighting words.

Today, nearly 10 years after the Supreme Court decision, figures compiled by the Southern Education Reporting Service indicate that about 257,000 Negro children are attending public elementary and high schools with white students in 17 southern and border states and the District of Columbia.

Negro leaders say this is about eight per cent of the school-age total.

Apart from the schools, new sectors opened in the fight for civil rights.

In 1955 and 1956, the Southern Christian

Growing

Leadership (SCLC) conference, headed by the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., boycotted segregated bus lines in Montgomery, Ala. They won.

The boycott, or "selective buying," as the Negro leaders prefer to say, began coming into play as a potent weapon in other parts of the South. Negro economists estimate that the purchasing power of the Negro, nationally, is around $15 billion a year.

"Selective buying" has put southern businessmen in a vise. If they integrate some facilities after a Negro boycott, they may be hit by a white boycott.

Along with the boycott came the "sit-in," the tactic of simply sitting quietly in a restaurant, seeking service. Or the "kneel-in," crowds of Negroes praying on the steps of a public building or in a main street, stopping traffic.

These maneuvers were pioneered by the Committee On Racial Equality (CORE) which was founded in 1942 at the University of Chicago. It obtained a foothold in the South with the "sit-in" of 1960.

Parallel with action on these fronts, the Negroes began concentrating their efforts in another supremely important field—voter registration. Another Negro organization, the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee ("SNICK") has been active in this work.

The Justice Department has assisted. Since 1961, it has filed 29 suits against officials for refusing to register qualified Negroes. About 50 per cent of these suits have been won.

The Southern Regional Council estimates there are 5,045,000 Negroes of voting age in 11 southern and border states. About one fourth, some 1,344,000, are registered.

Many tactics have been used to discourage Negroes from registering—gerrymandering, intimidation, widely-spaced meetings of registration boards, throwing out Negro applications on technicalities.

So concerted voter-registration drives began. Students went through Negro communities, ringing doorbells. Officials stationed themselves in public buildings in the South, buttonholing every Negro who came in, whatever his business, and urging him to register, there and then. Voter "clinics" were set up to instruct Negroes in filling out the application forms, and in meeting the technicalities.

It is a long, slow process, but the figures for Negro registration are rising, spectacularly in some cases. In Bullock County, Ala., there were four registered Negroes in 1961. Now there are 1,341. This, of course, is a special case.

Of the registration drives, Bishop George W. Barber, of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible Negro voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

In all probability, another factor has played a part in the Negro drive for equality, a subtle, unmeasurable factor—the new African nations.

The American Negro has seen African heads of state being received in the White House and getting the red carpet treatment from Soviet Premier Khrushchev and other powerful leaders. He has seen African diplomats speaking from the rostrum of the United Nations.

This has been a source of pride and encouragement.

But it also is a two-edged sword. "An African in a robe and turban can go into a restaurant or a hotel where I can't go," said a Negro public relations man in Washington. "How silly can segregation be? How do you think this makes me feel?"

Then came another catalyst—Birmingham.

Last spring, Negroes there demonstrated in the streets for desegregation of some facilities in downtown stores and the formation of a permanent biracial committee to handle racial problems. So many were arrested that the jails overflowed.

Police dogs and fire hoses were used to disperse the crowds. It was not the first time the dogs had been used in Birmingham. The first time was against white men, rioting around "Freedom Riders" at a bus station. Nor, of course, was Birmingham the only city to use dogs.

Police dogs have been used against both whites and Negroes in America's racial conflict. In Baltimore, above left, policemen and their dogs converge on a white heckler protesting integration of a swimming pool. In Birmingham, above, right, the dogs were used to disperse crowds of Negro demonstrators.

Nevertheless, photographs of dogs leaping toward Negroes went around the globe.

For some reason, Birmingham appears to have dramatized the Negro struggle more than any other incident.

"Birmingham engineered the revolution that began in the spring of 1963," Martin Ochs, editor of the Chattanooga Times, said in a recent speech at the University of Wisconsin.

Fear of violence and economic trouble has fostered a "mood of reconciliation" toward racial integration in the South, Ochs said.

Almost overnight after Birmingham, too, Negro demonstrations erupted in the North. Violence flared in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and other northern cities. The Los Angeles Times published a cartoon depicting two Negro figures, one in a menacing posture. It was captioned, "integration not intimidation.

In the North, Negro demands focus mainly on jobs and housing. Negro unemployment is high, more than double white unemployment. Labor unions have been accused of discriminating against Negroes. Negro leaders are demanding that a certain quota of Negroes shall be employed on given projects, and even in restaurants.

In New York City, to dramatize these and other demands, Negroes entered the offices of Gov. Nelson Rockefeller and stayed for days in a "sit-in." They staged another in the city hall.

Another recent development has been a unifying move among seven Negro organizations, some of which had been sniping at each other. They were the NAACP, CORE, SCLC, "SNICK," the National Urban League, the National Council of Negro Women, and the Legal Defense and Education Fund of the NAACP, a separately incorporated organization.

The coalition takes the name Council for United Civil Rights Leadership.

"Our primary concern is to eliminate violence," a spokesman said. "We want to provide a cadre of experienced Negro leaders who will prevent things from getting out of hand and keep irresponsible elements from turning to violence."

Distinctly separate from these groups are the "Black Muslims." They demand, not integration, but total segregation on their own terms. They want the federal government to set aside territory in which they propose to set up a Negro state.

Their leader, Muhammad Elijah, lives in Phoenix, Ariz. In answer to the question of whether the "Muslims" hate white people, he said:

"The Bible teaches us to love good and to hate evil. I can't love him (the white) because his is the very essence of evil."

In the vast, complicated and potentially dangerous picture of the racial struggle today, what are the positive sides? The principal ones would seem to be these:

1. To a greater degree than ever before, the problem is out in the open. More people, especially in the North but in the South, too, are aware of the intricacies and the injustices. More are thinking about it, seeking solutions.

2. Some degree of communication between the races is being restored in the South. Communications, southerners say, generally tended to break down after the Supreme Court decision on the schools in 1954. Now, fitfully and with difficulty, Negroes and whites in some parts of the South are sitting down together again. One southern newspaper publisher called such a meeting in his own plant—and deliberately placed the conference table where it could be seen through the window from the sidewalk.

3. President Kennedy, in conferences with scores of southern businessmen, clergymen and others, has sought means to desegregate many establishments. He set up a presidential committee on equal job opportunity, replacing two other such committees of the Eisenhower administration. It is headed by Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson.

4. Congress is hearing testimony on the president's package of civil rights legislation. On June 11, he asked Congress to "make a commitment it has not fully made in this century to the proposition that race has no place in American life or law." Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy told the House judiciary committee, "This bill before you today embodies that commitment."

5. While the Negroes are crying for rights, a Negro lawyer, Mrs. Cora T. Walker, is making speeches sharply reminding them of their responsibilities. She tells them:

"We are as much to blame for our present condition as the white majority."

On the political side, she says, "There are approximately one million black people in New York City. These Negroes have no restrictions on their voting rights. Yet there are only two elected Negroes in the entire city legislative government."

Of the economic situation, Mrs. Walker says, "In Harlem alone, Negroes spend $150 million a year on automobiles, $80 million on liquor, $75 million on wigs and hair pieces, $100 million on playing the numbers. More than 90 per cent of the businesses in our ghettos are owned, controlled and managed by whites outside of the community. We give minimum support to our own, who are in businesses or professions."

Of some social facts, she says, "We now are the major statistic in juvenile delinquency, dope addiction, crime, and school drop-outs. Is this why 75 per cent of the out-of-wedlock children are born of our race?"

Mrs. Walker suggests that Negroes should do more to help each other. "Isn't it our responsibility," she asks, "to take the initiative to secure the needs of our [illegible] privileged?"

She says she has never had an adverse reaction from Negro audiences. "On the contrary, there have been more than 500 requests for reprints of these speeches."

A similar position was taken recently by another minority group, the "Nisei," or American-born Japanese. In San Francisco, Howard Imazeki, editor of the newspaper, Hobukei Mainichi, said in an editorial:

"We have yet to hear any Negro voices blaming themselves for their social maladjustment.

"What we are trying to say most sincerely here is that the Negro leaders should do a little soul-searching of their own."

Nearly 72 years ago, on Aug. 19, 1891, the New York Mail & Express published a pathetic little item. It said some Negro clergymen had met to discuss means of obtaining "better opportunities" for their people.

Today, the Negro drive is for fully equal opportunity, for everything America offers every citizen.

AP Newsfeatures

TOPEKA, KANS.
CAPITAL-JOURNAL
SUN. 70,316

AUG 11 1963

Racial Problem Now Out In Open

Birmingham Episode Cements Negro Equality Fight

EDITOR'S NOTE—Caught in the turmoil of a summer of bitter racial discord, Americans find it difficult at times to assess the dimensions of the crisis, to know what has been gained or lost and where we are heading now. Here, in the last of a special series of Associated Press articles on the integration struggle, is a report by a correspondent who has covered it closely. It sums up the situation to date and looks at changes coming.

By RELMAN MORIN

NEW YORK — (AP) — The Negro drive for full equality has reached the dimensions of a national convulsion.

It wracks the whole United States, not just the Southern states. It is breaching the invisible racial barriers of the North no less than the visible walls in the South, shattering the complacency of one region, defeating the slow-down strategy of the other.

"Something's got hold of me," the Negro is chanting. "We shall overcome," is his anthem.

His movement is in the streets, the courts, the halls of Congress.

* * *

IT TOUCHES schools and employment practices, a seat at a lunch counter and a home in a better neighborhood, the right to vote and the right to worship in any church, the right to sit in any public park and to read a book in any public library — in short, the rights of an American citizen and access to equal opportunity.

Starting as non-violent, his campaign has engendered violence. The blood of both races has been spilled. No one can say whether more will flow, or where, or how much.

"We will advise our people not to use violence," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), at a news conference in Jackson, Miss. "The Negro can't win in a pitched battle with the whites. He's in the minority."

But can the Negro leaders control their followers, everywhere and at all times? Who, for example, speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

—AP Newsfeatures Photo

VOTING INSTRUCTION—A prospective voter is shown how to operate a voting machine by an instructor with a drawing of an average voting machine. This "clinic," one of a number set up in the South, is operated by members of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference in Atlanta, Ga. It is just one of a number of ways Negroes are trying to encourage members of their race to vote.

Violence begets violence and the possibility of a white counter-reaction has been noted by many observers. "If that happens," said Hodding Carter, editor of the Greenville, Miss., Delta-Democrat, "all hell will break loose."

* * *

THE HOUR seems late. Is it one minute to 12 now? If so, what raced the hands of the clock?

The story is soon told.

After World War II, the first important federal government action in race relations came when President Truman ordered the end of segregation in the Armed Forces. He also asked Congress for strong civil rights legislation. It was not granted.

During President Eisenhower's second administration, Congress enacted civil rights bills in 1957 and 1960. Using these laws, the administration filed 10 suits on behalf of Negroes' voting rights in the South.

The historic year, however, in the long and anguished struggle over civil rights, was 1954. The U.S. Supreme Court struck down, as unconstitutional, the doctrine of "separate - but - equal" in public schools. Segregation had been a legal fact for 58 years, based on a decision of the Supreme Court in 1896. Now, the court ordered the schools to be desegregated "with all deliberate speed."

Negroes and their white sympathizers exulted.

But the segregationists, eying that phrase, "with all deliberate speed," saw an escape hatch. He determined to resist as long as possible. And he did.

Mob violence exploded in Southern and border states.

* * *

A CLIMACTIC point in this stage was Little Rock, Ark. The year was 1957. Exactly 80 years after the end of the Reconstruction in the South, federal troops marched into a Southern city again. They used bayonets to disperse crowds around Central High School. And they escorted Negro children into classrooms.

Long before these incidents, however, the "bright-new-day" jubilance of 1954 had begun to evaporate.

Negro disappointment as the years passed with little desegregation, turned to bitterness. "Gradualism," the policy of slowly ending segregation, and "tokenism" permitting only a handful of Negro children in school, offices or factories, became fighting words.

Today, nearly 10 years after the Supreme Court decision, figures compiled by the Southern Education Reporting Service indicate that about 257,000 Negro children are attending public elementary and high schools with white students in 17 Southern and border states and the District of Columbia.

Negro leaders say this is about eight per cent of the school-age total.

* * *

APART FROM the schools, new sectors opened in the fight for civil rights.

In 1955 and 1956, the Southern Christian Leadership (SCLC) Conference, headed by the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., boycotted segregated bus lines in Montgomery, Ala. They won.

The boycott, or "selective buying," as the Negro leaders prefer to say, began coming into play as a potent weapon in other parts of the South. Negro economists estimate that the purchasing power of the Negro, nationally, is around $15 billion a year.

Along with the boycott came the "sit-in," the tactic of simply sitting quietly in a restaurant, seeking service. Or the "kneel-in," crowds of Negroes praying on the steps of a public building or in a main street, stopping traffic.

These maneuvers were pioneered by the Committee on Racial Equality (CORE) which was founded in 1942 at the University of Chicago. It obtained a foothold in the South with the "sit-in" of 1960.

* * *

PARALLEL with action on these fronts, the Negroes began concentrating their efforts in another supremely important field — voter registration. Another Negro organization, the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee ("SNICK") has been active in this work.

—AP Newsfeatures Photo

WHAT'S IN THE FUTURE?—What lies in the future for this young Negro family walking along a Harlem street in New York? Will the Negro drive for full equality, now wracking the entire United States, be successful within their lifetime? Will the future hold a discrimination-free life of opportunity for their children?

The Justice Department has assisted. Since 1961, it has filed 29 suits against officials for refusing to register qualified Negroes. About 50 per cent of these suits have been won.

The Southern Regional Council estimates there are 5,045,000 Negroes of voting age in 11 Southern and border states. About one fourth, some 1,344,000, are registered.

Many tactics have been used to discourage Negroes from registering — gerrymandering, intimidation, widely-spaced meetings of registration boards, throwing out Negro applications on technicalities.

So concerted voter-registraion drives began. Students went through Negro communities, ringing doorbells. Officials stationed themselves in public buildings in the South, buttonholing every Negro who came in, whatever his business, and urging him to register, there and then. Voter "clinics" were set up to instruct Negroes in filling out the application forms, and in meeting the technicalities.

It is a long, slow process, but the figures for Negro registration are rising, spectacularly in some cases. In Bullock County, Ala., there were four registered Negroes in 1961. Now there are 1,341. This, of course, is a special case.

* * *

THEN CAME another catalyst —Birmingham.

Last spring, Negroes there demonstrated in the streets for desegregation of some facilities in downtown stores and the formation of a permanent biracial committee to handle racial problems. So many were arrested that the jails overflowed.

Police dogs and fire hoses were used to disperse the crowds. It was not the first time the dogs had been used in Birmingham. The first time was against white men, rioting around "Freedom Riders" at a bus station. Nor, of course, was Birmingham the only city to use dogs.

Nevertheless, photographs of dogs leaping toward Negroes went around the globe.

For some reason, Birmingham appears to have dramatized the Negro struggle more than any other incident.

Almost overnight after Birmingham, too, Negro demonstrations erupted in the North. Violence flared in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and other Northern cities.

In the North, Negro demands focus mainly on jobs and housing. Negro unemployment is high, more than double white unemployment. Labor unions have been accused of discriminating against Negroes. Negro leaders are demanding that a certain quota of Negroes shall be employed on given projects, and even in restaurants.

* * *

IN THE vast, complicated and potentially dangerous picture of the racial struggle today, what are the positive sides? The principal ones would seem to be these:

1. To a greater degree than ever before, the problem is out in the open. More people, especially in the North but in the South, too, are aware of the intricacies and the injustices. More are thinking about it, seeking solutions.

2. Some degree of communication between the races is being restored in the South. Communications, Southerners say, generally tended to break down after the Supreme Court decision on the schools in 1954. Now, fitfully and with difficulty, Negroes and whites in some parts of the South are sitting down together again.

3. President Kennedy, in conferences with scores of Southern businessmen, clergymen and others, has sought means to desegregate many establishments. He set up a presidential Committee on Equal Job Opportunity, replacing two other such committees of the Eisenhower Administration. It is headed by Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson.

4. Congress is hearing testimony on the President's package of civil rights legislation.

EXPRESS and NEWS
SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
M. 107,787 SUN. 111,361

AUG 1 1 1963

THE DEEPENING CRISIS: SUMMING UP

Suddenly, The Time Is Late

By RELMAN MORIN

CAUGHT IN THE TURMOIL of a summer of bitter racial discord, Americans find it difficult at times to assess the dimensions of the crisis, to know what has been gained or lost and where we are heading now. Here, in the last of a special series of Associated Press articles on the integration struggle, is a report by a correspondent who has covered it closely. It sums up the situations to date and looks at changes coming.

NEW YORK (AP)—The Negro drive for full equality has reached the dimensions of a national convulsion.

It wracks the whole United States, not just the Southern states. It is breaching the invisible racial barriers of the North no less than the visible walls in the South, shattering the complacency of one region, defeating the slow-down strategy of the other.

"Something's got a-hold of me," the Negro is chanting. "We shall overcome," is his anthem.

His movement is in the streets, the courts, the halls of Congress.

It touches schools and employment practices, a seat at a lunch counter and a home in a better neighborhood, the right to vote and the right to worship in any church, the right to sit in any public park and to read a book in any public library—in short, the rights of an American citizen and access to equal opportunity.

Starting as nonviolent, his campaign has engendered violence. The blood of both races has been spilled. No one can say whether more will flow, or where, or how much.

"We will advise our people not to use violence," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, at a news conference in Jackson, Miss. "The Negro can't win in a pitched battle with the whites. He's in the minority."

But can the Negro leaders control their followers, everywhere and at all times? Who, for example, speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

"How can anyone ask me to be nonviolent?" said a Negro war veteran. "That's like putting me back in the line in Korea and loading my rifle with blanks."

Violence begets violence and the possibility of a white counter-reaction has been noted by many observers. "If that happens," said Hodding Carter, editor of the Greenville, Miss., Delta-Democrat, "all hell will break loose."

During the demonstrations in Birmingham last spring, a white taxi driver said to me, "If they kill any white people, I won't ask any questions. I'll just start killin'."

The hour seems late. Is it one minute to 12 now? If so, what raced the hands of the clock?

The story is soon told.

★ ★ ★

After World War II, the first important federal government action in race relations came when President Truman ordered the end of segregation in the armed forces. He also asked Congress for strong civil rights legislation. It was not granted.

During President Eisenhower's second administration, Congress enacted civil rights bills in 1957 and 1960. Using these laws, the administration filed 10 suits on behalf of Negroes' voting rights in the South.

The historic year, however, in the long and anguished struggle over civil rights, was 1954. The U.S. Supreme Court struck down CLIMACTIC POINT—In 1957, just 80 years after the end of the "reconstruction" in the South, race relations reached a climactic point at Little Rock, Ark. The eruption of violence brought in troops the 101st Airborne Div. from Fort Campbell, Ky., who guarded the city's Central High School with fixed bayonets and physically escorted Negro children to its classrooms to enforce segregation.

compiled by the Southern Education Reporting Service indicate that about 257,000 Negro children are attending public elementary and high schools with white students in 17 Southern and border states and the District of Columbia.

Negro leaders say this is about 8 per cent of the school-age total.

★ ★ ★

Apart from the schools, new sectors opened in the fight for civil rights.

In 1955 and 1956, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, headed by the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., boycotted segregated bus lines in Montgomery, Ala. They won.

The boycott, or "selective buying," as the Negro leaders prefer to say, began coming into play as a potent weapon in other parts of the South. Negro economists estimate that the purchasing power of the Negro, nationally, is around $15 billion a year.

"Selective buying" has put Southern businessmen in a vise. If they integrate some facilities after a Negro boycott, they may be hit by a white boycott.

Along with the boycott came the "sit-in," the tactic of simply sitting quietly in a restaurant, seeking service. Or the "kneel-in," crowds of Negroes praying on the steps of a public building or in a main street, stopping traffic.

within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

★ ★ ★

In all probability, another factor has played a part in the Negro drive for equality, a subtle, unmeasurable factor—the new African nations.

The American Negro has seen African heads of state being received in the White House and getting the red carpet treatment from Soviet Premier Khrushchev and other powerful leaders. He has seen African diplomats speaking from the rostrum of the United Nations.

This has been a source of pride and encouragement.

But it also is a two-edged sword. "An African in a robe and turban can go into a restaurant or a hotel where I can't go," said a Negro public relations man in Washington. "How silly can segregation be? How do you think this makes me feel?"

★ ★ ★

Then came another catalyst—Birmingham.

Last spring, Negroes there demonstrated in the streets for desegregation of some facilities in downtown stores and the formation of a permanent biracial committee to handle racial problems. So many were arrested that the jails overflowed.

erupted in the North. Violence flared in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and other Northern cities. The Los Angeles Times published a cartoon depicting two Negro figures, one in a menacing posture. It was captioned, "Integration, not intimidation."

In the North, Negro demands focus mainly on jobs and housing. Negro unemployment is high, more than double white unemployment. Labor unions have been accused of discriminating against Negroes. Negro leaders are demanding that a certain quota of Negroes shall be employed on given projects, and even in restaurants.

In New York City, to dramatize these and other demands, Negroes entered the offices of Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller and stayed for days in a sit-in. They staged another in the City Hall.

★ ★ ★

Another recent development has been a unifying move among seven Negro organizations, some of which had been sniping at each other. They were the NAACP, CORE, SCLC, "SNICK," the National Urban League, the National Council of Negro Women, and the Legal Defense and Education Fund of the NAACP, a separately incorporated organization.

The coalition takes the name Council for United Civil Rights Leadership.

racial struggle today, what are the positive sides? The principal ones would seem to be these:

1. To a greater degree than ever before, the problem is out in the open. More people, especially in the North but in the South, too, are aware of the intricacies and the injustices. More are thinking about it, seeking solutions.

2. Some degree of communication between the races is being restored in the South. Communications, Southerners say, generally tended to break down after the Supreme Court decision on the schools in 1954. Now, fitfully and with difficulty, Negroes and whites in some parts of the South are sitting down together again. One Southern newspaper publisher called such a meeting in his own plant—and deliberately placed the conference table where it could be seen through the window from the sidewalk.

3. President Kennedy, in conferences with scores of Southern businessmen, clergymen and others, has sought means to desegregate many establishments. He set up a presidential committee on equal job opportunity, replacing two other such committees of the Eisenhower administration. It is headed by Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson.

4. Congress is hearing testimony on the President's package of civil rights legislation. On June 11, he asked Congress to "make a commitment it has not fully made in this century to the proposition that race has no place in American life or law." Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy told the House Judiciary Committee, "This bill before you today embodies that commitment."

5. While the Negroes are crying for rights, a Negro lawyer, Cora T. Walker, is making speeches sharply reminding them of their responsibilities.

She tells them: "We are as much to blame for our present condition as the white majority."

On the political side, she says, "There are approximately one million black people in New York City. These Negroes have no restrictions on their voting rights. Yet there are only two elected Negroes in the entire city legislative government."

Of the economic situation, Mrs. Walker says, "In Harlem alone, Negroes spend $150 million a year on automobiles, $80 million on liquor, $75 million on wigs and hair pieces, $100 million on playing the numbers. More than 90 per cent of the businesses in our ghettos are owned, controlled and managed by whites outside of the community. We give minimum support to our own, who are in businesses or professions."

Of some social facts, she says, "We now are the major statistic in juvenile delinquency, dope addiction, crime, and school dropouts. Is this why 75 per cent of the out-of-wedlock children are born of our race?"

Mrs. Walker suggests that Negroes should do more to help each other. "Isn't it our responsibility," she asks, "to take the initiative to secure the needs of our underprivileged?"

She says she has never had an raced the hands of the clock?

The story is soon told.

★ ★ ★

After World War II, the first important federal government action in race relations came when President Truman ordered the end of segregation in the armed forces. He also asked Congress for strong civil rights legislation. It was not granted.

During President Eisenhower's second administration, Congress enacted civil rights bills in 1957 and 1960. Using these laws, the administration filed 10 suits on behalf of Negroes' voting rights in the South.

The historic year, however, in the long and anguished struggle over civil rights, was 1954. The U.S. Supreme Court struck down, as unconstitutional, the doctrine of "separate-but-equal" in public schools. Segregation had been a legal fact for 58 years, based on a decision of the Supreme Court in 1896. Now, the court ordered the schools to be desegregated "with all deliberate speed."

Negroes and their white sympathizers exulted.

But the segregationist, eying that phrase, "with all deliberate speed," saw an escape hatch. He determined to resist as long as possible. And he did.

Mob violence exploded in Southern and border states.

A climactic point of this stage was Little Rock, Ark. The year was 1957. Exactly 80 years after the end of the reconstruction in the South, federal troops marched into a Southern city again. They used bayonets to disperse crowds around Central High School. And they escorted Negro children into classrooms.

Elsewhere in the South, however, the barriers remained.

Oxford, Miss., and Tuscaloosa, Ala., were still to come.

At Oxford, two men died and scores were injured when a Negro, James H. Meredith, enrolled in the University of Mississippi. Again, federal troops marched, bivouacing on the campus.

At Tuscaloosa, Gov. George C. Wallace stood in the doorway of a University of Alabama building when Justice Department officials attempted to enroll two Negroes, Vivian Malome and James Hood. A few hours later, he stepped aside when federalized units of the National Guard marched onto the campus. There was no violence.

Long before these incidents, however, the "bright-new-day" jubilance of 1954 had begun to evaporate.

Negro disappointment, as the years passed with little desegregation, turned to bitterness. "Gradualism," the policy of slowly ending segregation, and "tokenism," permitting only a handful of Negro children in schools, offices or factories, became fighting words.

Today, nearly 10 years after the Supreme Court decision, figures gated bus lines in Montgomery, Ala. They won.

The boycott, or "selective buying," as the Negro leaders prefer to say, began coming into play as a potent weapon in other parts of the South. Negro economists estimate that the purchasing power of the Negro, nationally, is around $15 billion a year.

"Selective buying" has put Southern businessmen in a vise. If they integrate some facilities after a Negro boycott, they may be hit by a white boycott.

Along with the boycott came the "sit-in," the tactic of simply sitting quietly in a restaurant, seeking service. Or the "kneel-in," crowds of Negroes praying on the steps of a public building or in a main street, stopping traffic.

These maneuvers were pioneered by the Congress of Racial Equality, which was founded in 1942 at the University of Chicago. It obtained a foothold in the South with the sit-ins of 1960.

Parallel with action on these fronts, the Negroes began concentrating their efforts in another supremely important field — voter registration. Another Negro organization, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee — "SNICK"—has been active in this work.

The Justice Department has assisted. Since 1961, it has filed 29 suits against officials for refusing to register qualified Negroes. About 50 per cent of these suits have been won.

The Southern Regional Council estimates there are 5,045,000 Negroes of voting age in 11 Southern and border states. About one-fourth, some 1,344,000, are registered.

Many tactics have been used to discourage Negroes from registering — gerrymandering, intimidation, widely-spaced meetings of registration boards, throwing out Negro applications on technicalities.

So concerted voter-registration drives began. Students went through Negro communities, ringing doorbells. Officials stationed themselves in public buildings in the South, buttonholing every Negro who came in, whatever his business, and urging him to register, there and then. Voter "clinics" were set up to instruct Negroes in filling out the application forms, and in meeting the technicalities.

It is a long, slow process, but the figures for Negro registration are rising, spectacularly in some cases. In Bullock County, Alabama, there were four registered Negroes in 1961. Now there are 1,341. This, of course, is a special case.

Of the registration drives, Bishop George W. Barber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible Negro voter Nations.

This has been a source of pride and encouragement.

But it also is a two-edged sword. "An African in a robe and turban can go into a restaurant or a hotel where I can't go," said a Negro public relations man in Washington. "How silly can segregation be? How do you think this makes me feel?"

★ ★ ★

Then came another catalyst—Birmingham.

Last spring, Negroes there demonstrated in the streets for desegregation of some facilities in downtown stores and the formation of a permanent biracial committee to handle racial problems. So many were arrested that the jails overflowed.

Police dogs and fire hoses were used to disperse the crowds. It was not the first time the dogs had been used in Birmingham. The first time was against white men, rioting around "freedom riders" at a bus station. Nor, of course, was Birmingham the only city to use dogs.

Nevertheless, photographs of dogs leaping toward Negroes went around the globe.

For some reason, Birmingham appears to have dramatized the Negro struggle more than any other incident.

"Birmingham engineered the revolution that began in the spring of 1963," Martin Ochs, editor of the Chattanooga Times, said in a recent speech at the University of Wisconsin.

Fear of violence and economic trouble has fostered a "mood of reconciliation" toward racial integration in the South, Ochs said.

Almost overnight after Birmingham, too, Negro demonstrations

In New York City, to dramatize these and other demands, Negroes entered the offices of Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller and stayed for days in a sit-in. They staged another in the City Hall.

★ ★ ★

Another recent development has been a unifying move among seven Negro organizations, some of which had been sniping at each other. They were the NAACP, CORE, SCLC, "SNICK," the National Urban League, the National Council of Negro Women, and the Legal Defense and Education Fund of the NAACP, a separately incorporated organization.

The coalition takes the name Council for United Civil Rights Leadership.

"Our primary concern is to eliminate violence," a spokesman said. "We want to provide a cadre of experienced Negro leaders who will prevent things from getting out of hand and keep irresponsible elements from turning to violence."

Distinctly separate from these groups are the Black Muslims. They demand, not integration, but total segregation on their own terms. They want the federal government to set aside territory in which they propose to set up a Negro state.

Their leader, Muhammad Elijah, lives in Phoenix, Ariz. In answer to the question of whether the Muslims hate white people, he said:

"The Bible teaches us to love good and to hate evil. I can't love him (the white) because his is the very essence of evil."

★ ★ ★

In the vast, complicated and potentially dangerous picture of the

ing the numbers. More than 90 per cent of the businesses in our ghettos are owned, controlled and managed by whites outside of the community. We give minimum support to our own, who are in businesses or professions."

Of some social facts, she says, "We now are the major statistic in juvenile delinquency, dope addiction, crime, and school dropouts. Is this why 75 per cent of the out-of-wedlock children are born of our race?"

Mrs. Walker suggests that Negroes should do more to help each other. "Isn't it our responsibility," she asks, "to take the initiative to secure the needs of our underprivileged?"

She says she has never had an adverse reaction from Negro audiences. "On the contrary, there have been more than 500 requests for reprints of these speeches."

A similar position was taken recently by another minority group, the Nisei, or American-born Japanese. In San Francisco, Howard Imazeki, editor of the newspaper, Hobukei Mainichi, said in an editorial:

"We have yet to hear any Negro voices blaming themselves for their social maladjustment.

"What we are trying to say most sincerely here is that the Negro leaders should do a little soul-searching of their own."

★ ★ ★

Nearly 72 years ago, on Aug. 19, 1891, the New York Mail & Express published a pathetic little item. It said some Negro clergymen had met to discuss means of obtaining "better opportunities" for their people.

Today, the Negro drive is for fully equal opportunity, for everything America offers every citizen.

VOTING INSTRUCTION—A prospective voter is shown how to operate a voting machine by an instructor with a drawing of an average voting machine. This "clinic," one of a number set up in the South, is just one of a number of ways Negroes are trying to encourage members of their race to vote.—AP Photos.

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447

AUG 1 1 1963

AS THE CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT GROWS IN THE NORTH—CLASHES IN THREE CITIES

INDIANAPOLIS: A racially mixed crowd stages the city's first civil rights protest. Sign refers to President, Governor and Mayor.

ELIZABETH, N. J.: A dump truck is stopped at a construction site by a sit-down strike as part of a campaign by Negroes to gain admission to apprenticeships in the unions involved on the project.

Associated Press, United Press International

CHICAGO: Police and demonstrators scuffle during one of a series of incidents after Negro family moved into a white neighborhood.

Balance Sheet

On Civil Rights

Where does the race crisis stand? The consensus last week, at midpoint in this summer of Negro discontent, was that these main conclusions could be drawn:

First, that the integrationists have made considerable headway—in the South against public segregation, in the North against white apathy toward discrimination.

Second, that the path toward equality still stretches a vast distance. Most difficult to deal with, it is recognized, is the severe economic handicap the Negro suffers from discrimination in education and jobs.

Third, that the psychological climate may be deeply affected by what Congress does about the President's call for major legislation against segregation, even though the legislation would leave strators and the murder of the Negro leader Medgar Evers.

What the integration movement in the South has accomplished overall is impossible to measure precisely. The Justice Department, on the basis of reports by businessmen and other groups whose cooperation was sought by the Administration, says that there has been "improvement" in 319 cities in the 11 states of the old Confederacy plus four border states. The Southern Regional Council, an integrationist group, says a summary of newspaper reports up to July 24 showed "some desegregation" in 79 cities in the former Confederate states.

In the North the targets are forms of discrimination that are commonplace despite many laws against them. One is the confinement of Negroes to black ghettoes by residential discrimination. In Chicago last week a formerly all-white district on the South Side came to the verge of violence as whites milled in the streets in sul-has been scant evidence of compliance.

However, developments last week in New York and Washington gave the integrationists hope of at least some progress. In New York, Governor Rockefeller made a deal with the leaders of protest picketing at the Downstate Medical Center project in Brooklyn. Among other things, the Governor promised stricter enforcement of the state's anti-discrimination laws and a procedure by which the state and Negro leaders would cooperate in recruiting Negro applicants for union membership.

'More Promises'

The agreement caused some confusion in Negro ranks. Militants objected that it amounted only to "more promises."

Nevertheless, the picketing was sharply reduced. Friday Mr. Rockefeller ordered the State Employment Service to assign consultants to work with the Negro leaders.

In Washington the Labor Department and a labor-management the rights of the owners of the properties involved.

At the same time, Republicans generally have emphasized that they are not against action on civil rights. This was in evidence last week in a vote in the House on a bill on Federal aid for vocational education. The Republicans pressed an amendment to deny aid to schools that practice segregation. Democrats accused them of politicking at the possible expense of a program that would benefit many Negroes. The argument was that the amendment would put the bill in jeopardy because of Southern opposition. The amendment was rejected by 217-181.

Negro skepticism about the Republicans' sincerity was voiced during the week at a "legislative strategy conference" on the Administration's program held by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the N.A.A.C.P., said: "I am inclined to agree that the Republicans want the Negro to be free, but free

INDIANAPOLIS: A racially mixed crowd stages the city's first civil rights protest. Sign refers to President, Governor and Mayor.

ELIZABETH, N. J.: A dump truck is stopped at a construction site by a sit-down strike as part of a campaign by Negroes to gain admission to apprenticeships in the unions involved on the project.

Associated Press, United Press

CHICAGO: Police and demonstrators scuffle during one of incidents after Negro family moved into a white neig

Balance Sheet

On Civil Rights

Where does the race crisis stand? The consensus last week, at midpoint in this summer of Negro discontent, was that these main conclusions could be drawn:

First, that the integrationists have made considerable headway—in the South against public segregation, in the North against white apathy toward discrimination.

Second, that the path toward equality still stretches a vast distance. Most difficult to deal with, it is recognized, is the severe economic handicap the Negro suffers from discrimination in education and jobs.

Third, that the psychological climate may be deeply affected by what Congress does about the President's call for major legislation against segregation, even though the legislation would leave many areas of discrimination untouched.

Fourth, that the whole race question is enmeshed in politics — Federal, state and local — and specifically that the race issue is likely to be a large factor in the race for the Presidency in '64.

Last week the struggle went on, in South and North, in the streets and in Congress. All sides seemed to be looking toward what may prove to be one of the dramatic climaxes in the struggle in '63, the huge rally in Washington Aug. 28 to impress Congress with the power and determination in the integration movement.

In the Streets

The struggle in the streets represents a reaction against the slow pace and "token" results of litigation in the Federal courts. It is a culmination of the shift toward direct action that began with the freedom rides and sit-ins of three years ago. It has marked—especially since the drama of Birmingham last spring, with its nationwide impact — a broadening of the protest movement to encompass North as well as South. According to a Justice Department count that began May 22, during the Birmingham crisis, the total of demonstrations has been 841 in 196 cities in 35 states and the District of Columbia.

The protests have set contrasting patterns South and North. In the South, the main immediate target has been segregation in places of public accommodation—restaurants, hotels and the like.

The results have been mixed. Symbolically the greatest victory, as integrationists see it, was in Birmingham. The small gains there —such as the setting up of a timetable for integration of downtown lunch counters—were hailed as significant because of that city's record as one of the most segregated anywhere and because of their electrifying effect on Negroes elsewhere. Integrationists have been heartened also by sweeping gains in many cities in the upper South and border areas — in some cases without direct Negro pressure.

Aftermath in Jackson

But there have also been failures and bitterness — as in Jackson, Miss., where a few Negro policemen have been hired, (to patrol Negro districts) after strife that led to the arrest of 1,000 demonstrators and the murder of the Negro leader Medgar Evers.

What the integration movement in the South has accomplished overall is impossible to measure precisely. The Justice Department, on the basis of reports by businessmen and other groups whose cooperation was sought by the Administration, says that there has been "improvement" in 319 cities in the 11 states of the old Confederacy plus four border states. The Southern Regional Council, an integrationist group, says a summary of newspaper reports up to July 24 showed "some desegregation" in 79 cities in the former Confederate states.

In the North the targets are forms of discrimination that are commonplace despite many laws against them. One is the confinement of Negroes to black ghettoes by residential discrimination. In Chicago last week a formerly all-white district on the South Side came to the verge of violence as whites milled in the streets in sullen protest against four Negro families that moved into the neighborhood.

Englewood's Problem

A second form of discrimination is de facto school segregation that results from residential discrimination. One of the focal points of conflict over this issue is Englewood, N. J. Negro protests there led to a state order last month for correction of the racial "imbalance" of the Lincoln School, which is 98.8 per cent Negro. The week before last the school board approved a plan for voluntary transfer of pupils out of Lincoln. Last week a Committee to Save Our Neighborhood Schools protested the plan as a "complete capitulation" to the Negroes.

A third form of discrimination—and an explosive one—is job discrimination. Many statistics attest to it. The rate of unemployment among Negroes is twice that among whites. The average Negro worker earns only about 55 per cent as much as his white counterpart. The many Negroes who are unskilled are being hit particularly hard by the elimination of unskilled jobs through automation.

Negroes were in the streets in several Northern cities last week protesting against job discrimination. They staged a sit-in at City Hall in Newark, N. J.; paraded in Indianapolis; picketed General Motors and the United Automobile Workers in Detroit; picketed a courthouse building site in Elizabeth, N. J.; picketed a medical-school building site and others in New York.

Focus on Construction

The brunt of the Negro protest was mainly against the construction industry. Hiring in that industry is controlled largely by unions because only union members are hired. Some of the unions are accused of barring or limiting Negro membership; some are said to have made it impossible for Negroes even to learn the trades by discriminating in admitting youths to apprenticeship. (In fact some unions go so far as to bar systematically all who are not sons or nephews of present members.)

The problem has proved to be a hard one for integrationists to crack. For one thing, membership in most unions is under local control. Recently the international officers of the AFL-CIO building trades unions called upon locals to lower the racial bars but there has been scant evidence of compliance.

However, developments last week in New York and Washington gave the integrationists hope of at least some progress. In New York, Governor Rockefeller made a deal with the leaders of protest picketing at the Downstate Medical Center project in Brooklyn. Among other things, the Governor promised stricter enforcement of the state's anti-discrimination laws and a procedure by which the state and Negro leaders would cooperate in recruiting Negro applicants for union membership.

'More Promises'

The agreement caused some confusion in Negro ranks. Militants objected that it amounted only to "more promises."

Nevertheless, the picketing was sharply reduced. Friday Mr. Rockefeller ordered the State Employment Service to assign consultants to work with the Negro leaders.

In Washington the Labor Department and a labor-management committee in the construction industry agreed on a plan to combat discrimination in apprenticeship. The plan calls for local apprenticeship committees to judge all applicants solely on the basis of job qualifications. The Labor Department is to be briefed monthly on execution of the program.

Labor department officials were elated over what they felt was a major breakthrough against discrimination. There was cautioning, however, that the plan hinged on local compliance, which has been sought before without much success.

Moreover, it was pointed out that the plan touches only one aspect of the problem in one sector of an economy that is shot through with racial discrimination. Much more must be done, it is recognized, if the Negro's discontent is to be alleviated.

And in Congress

The President's civil rights program has been moving slowly in Congress. It went to Capitol Hill nearly eight weeks ago. In the House, the Judiciary Committee has now completed hearings. In the Senate, the Commerce Committee has ended hearings on part of the program; the Judiciary Committee, which is Southern-dominated and has never reported a civil rights bill, is holding hearings that are expected to go on and on in order to provide ammunition for an eventual Southern filibuster.

As the schedule now shapes up, the House committee expects to report a bill to the floor after Labor Day for action as soon as tax legislation is out of the way. The Senate leadership figures to take up either the House bill or another one from the Senate Commerce Committee; that would prevent Senate Judiciary from bottling up the legislation.

But then the Administration's program would encounter the real obstacle—the promised Southern filibuster. To break a filibuster the Administration forces will need strong Republican support. That is in doubt because of controversy over the program's key provision —Title II, the outlawing of segregation in places of public accommodation.

The uncertainty about the degree of Republican support has arisen chiefly because of opposition to Title II by Minority Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen. His objection is that it would infringe the rights of the owners of the properties involved.

At the same time, Republicans generally have emphasized that they are not against action on civil rights. This was in evidence last week in a vote in the House on a bill on Federal aid for vocational education. The Republicans pressed an amendment to deny aid to schools that practice segregation. Democrats accused them of politicking at the possible expense of a program that would benefit many Negroes. The argument was that the amendment would put the bill in jeopardy because of Southern opposition. The amendment was rejected by 217-181.

Negro skepticism about the Republicans' sincerity was voiced during the week at a "legislative strategy conference" on the Administration's program held by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the N.A.A.C.P., said: "I am inclined to agree that the Republicans want the Negro to be free, but free somewhere over yonder. If they are worrying about getting Negro support . . . they should adopt a positive policy and out-Kennedy the Kennedys." Mr. Dirksen, who was at the meeting, said he would abide by principles "I learned at my mother's knee."

Eyes on Aug. 28

One of the unknowns in the situation is the effect of the rally in Washington Aug. 28. Negro leaders spoke of it at first as a "march on Washington" and said there would be sit-ins in the Capitol. After warnings that those tactics would only create Congressional resentment and hurt the program's chances, they decided against mass demonstrations near the Capitol. Instead the rally will take place mainly at the Lincoln Memorial.

In Congress last week the general attitude toward the rally was that if it turned out to be orderly it would not change any votes but that if it proved otherwise the rally would help the opposition. The feeling was that in any case the huge outpouring—the Negro leaders say they expect 150,000—will have an important effect on the psychological climate surrounding civil rights.

As for the politics, most observers feel that Negroes, who were strong for Mr. Kennedy in '60 but dissatisfied with his performance until recently, will be strong for him again in '64. The question is whether there will be a counteraction because of a feeling among white voters that the Administration has fanned the Negro unrest.

The New York Times
D. 681,612 S. 1,304,447
AUG 1 1 1963

GAINS ON CIVIL RIGHTS WHET APPETITE FOR MORE

A Number of Cities Have Modified or Ended Racial Restrictions But the Prospect of Continued Agitation Has Increased

By CLAUDE SITTON

The mid-point of a summer of racial crisis has passed in the South with neither the widespread violence so freely predicted nor the immediate desegregation so militantly demanded. But the concern expressed following the Birmingham, Ala., controversy and the rising pressure for racial change to which that controversy contributed still remain.

Demonstrations against racial barriers have continued throughout the 11 Old South states from Virginia to Texas, although at a slightly reduced level from the immediate post-Birmingham period. Similar protests in the North and the absence of a conflict with the dramatic elements of earlier crises have given the impression of a lull that is more apparent than real.

A recent compilation by the Southern Regional Council, for example, shows that between June 24 and July 24 demonstrations took place in at least 37 communities in the region. It also pointed up the impressive progress achieved by the Negro during that time.

The most symbolic of these victories came in Birmingham following more than a month of mass marches and other protests under the leadership of the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, and the Rev. Fred L. Shuttlesworth, president of the Alabama Christian Movement for Human Rights.

Birmingham

Negroes have voiced satisfaction over the good faith shown by Birmingham's white leaders in implementing an agreement that ended the crisis and in going beyond it to improve the city's race relations. Lunch counters and other facilities in many downtown department and variety stores have been desegregated, Negroes have been promoted to other than menial positions and still others have been hired. City officials have reopened public parks on a desegregated basis.

Even more impressive is the number of communities throughout the South in which racial restrictions have been modified or eliminated. The Southern Regional Council's informal check indicates that in the 30 days covered at least 50 cities and towns made some change in custom. Others took steps such as formation of biracial committees that may lead to future progress.

Both the pressure for change and the compromises it has brought have been most extensive, perhaps, in North Carolina. Segregation in governmental installations and privately owned public facilities, including hotels, motels and restaurants, has been wiped out almost entirely in some cities. Unfortunately, Negro campaigns in others have brought sporadic outbursts of rioting. But a majority of the communities have accepted change, often at the urging of moderate business and industrial leaders concerned over the economic effects of racial strife.

Their motivation is apparent in a statement attributed by the council to Mayor Wilbur Clark of Fayetteville following desegregation of the only municipally owned swimming pool: "If we don't make progress here we will greatly harm our prospects for attracting new industries and businesses and, secondly, we will have renewed demonstrations . . . which aggravate possibilities of ill will, economic loss and public danger." The fact that Mayor Clark was not alone was demonstrated a few days later when 200 mayors from all sections of the state voted unanimously to support Gov. Terry Sanford in efforts to "'remove the indignities long suffered by Negroes.'"

Resistant Areas

However, much of the progress has taken place outside the Deep South or in the larger cities of the latter areas. And there is considerable doubt that these advances can be duplicated in the near future in the more resistant sections. One expert in the field noted that the 1960 sit-in demonstrations, which began Feb. 1, had brought lunch-counter desegregation in more than 100 cities by the summer but then entered a period in which little progress was made.

Nevertheless, the determination of Negroes to press their drive for desegregation even in the face of repeated defeats remains strong. This is indicated in a report by Joseph A. Loftus of The New York Times from Jackson, Miss.:

"Actually, the Negroes do not know quite where to turn, but the force of their moral conviction will drive them only on even though the course be blindly taken. The white supremacists and their disciplined police are equally determined. A collision seems inevitable."

Jackson offers a typical example of the small but frustrating denials of the rights of citizenship encountered by Negroes daily in some Deep South communities.

A pregnant Negro mother, writing to her husband, an Air Force major on duty in Berlin, told of taking her small son to the Jackson zoo. She became tired and sat down on a bench. A policeman ordered her to move on. The Rev. L. T. Smith of the Jackson Movement for Freedom, who recounted the story, concluded by asking: "Do you know any reason why a Negro boy should not be allowed to look at the giraffes?"

Bitterness over small incidents and concern for the problems of voting rights, equal employment and discrimination in public accommodations underlie the support now becoming evident among Negroes for what may be the largest demonstration of all. This is the scheduled Aug. 28 "March for Freedom and Jobs" on Washington.

Senate Testimony

Observers doubt that the objective of the march—Congressional enactment of President Kennedy's civil rights proposals—would end mass protests in the South or the North. Many do believe that their rejection would encourage continuing resistance to change in the Deep South and, quite possibly, retrogression in areas where progress has been made. This has been underscored in a statement before a Senate committee by Mayor Ivan Allen Jr. of Atlanta in which he urged passage of a public accommodations bill.

Mayor Allen said that any law should give local governments an opportunity to solve the problem first. However, he contended that failure to approve legislation to force the issue would "create another round of disputes over segregation." He then said:

"Surely, the Congress realizes that after having failed to take any definite action on this subject in the last 10 years, to fail to pass this bill would amount to an endorsement of private business setting up an entirely new status of discrimination throughout the nation. Cities like Atlanta might slip backwards. Hotels and restaurants that have already taken this issue upon themselves and opened their doors might find it convenient to go back to the old status. Failure by Congress to take definite action at this time is by inference an endorsement of the right of private business to practice racial discrimination and, in my opinion, would start the same old round of squabbles and demonstrations that we have had in the past."

Filibuster

The Congressional battle over the rights legislation has other significant aspects. The measures are now likely to go to the Senate floor early in September. There, they undoubtedly will encounter a Southern filibuster. In the present atmosphere, this might lead to greatly stepped-up Negro demonstrations.

The debate probably will be going on at the time when 113 public school districts in the Southern and border states begin desegregation for the first time. This is the largest number to lower racial barriers since 1956, according to the Southern Education Reporting Service.

Further, the systems include such potential trouble spots as Birmingham and Mobile, Ala.; Jacksonville and Tallahassee, Fla.; Chatham County (Savannah) and possibly Albany, Ga.; Baton Rouge, La., and Danville, Va.

Few Predictions

Added to these harbingers of crisis is the growing militancy among civil rights factions. This has brought violence in some communities such as Savannah, where the authorities went to great lengths to protect the Negro's right to demonstrate. White liberals have been discouraged by the reluctance of some Negro leaders to denounce such lawlessness and the attempts by a handful of the latter to justify it.

Few observers will risk a prediction as to the course the struggle may take during the remaining summer months and early fall. One respected student of the field, who declined use of his name, offered this assessment: "I don't think summer's over by a long shot. The flames in Congress will fan the flames out in the country and then in Congress again. September can be a very, very tough month."

Englehardt in The St. Louis Post-Dispatch

"You're inflaming the country!"

THE MIAMI NEWS
MIAMI, FLA.
D. 154,397 S. 137,140

AUG 1 1 1963

White Faces In The South

Caught in the turmoil of a summer of bitter racial discord, Americans find it difficult to know what has been gained or lost and where we are heading. Here in the last of a series, the Associated Press sums up the integration struggle and looks at changes coming.

Faces Of The American Negro

All-Out Negro Drive Erupts Into Convulsion

The DEEPENING CRISIS

By RELMAN MORIN

THE NEGRO drive for full equality has reached the dimensions of a national convulsion.

It wracks the whole United States, not just the Southern states. It is breaching the invisible racial barriers of the North no less than the visible walls in the South, shattering the complacency of one region, defeating the slowdown strategy of the other.

"Something's got a-hold of me," the Negro is chanting. "We shall overcome" is his anthem.

His movement is in the streets, the courts, the halls of Congress.

It touches schools and employment practices, a seat at a lunch counter and a home in a better neighborhood, the right to vote and the right to worship in any church, the right to sit in any public park and to read a book in any public library — in short, the rights of an American citizen and access to equal opportunity.

Starting as nonviolent, his campaign has engendered violence. The blood of both races has been spilled. No one can say whether more will flow, or where, or how much.

"We will advise our people not to use violence," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), at a news conference in Jackson, Miss. "The Negro can't win in a pitched battle with the whites. He's in the minority."

But can the Negro leaders control their followers, everywhere and at all times? Who, for example, speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

"How can anyone ask me to be nonviolent?" said a Negro war veteran. "That's like putting me back in the line in Korea and loading my rifle with blanks."

Violence begets violence and the possibility of a white counter-reaction has been noted by many observers. "If that happ[illegible]

U. S. Supreme Court struck down as unconstitutional the doctrine of "separate-but-equal" in public schools.

Segregation had been a legal fact for 58 years, based on a decision of the Supreme Court in 1896. Now, the court ordered the schools to be desegregated "with all deliberate speed."

Negroes and their white sympathizers exulted.

But the segregationist, eyeing that phrase, "with all deliberate speed," saw an escape hatch. He determined to resist as long as possible. And he did.

Mob violence exploded in Southern and border states.

A climactic point of this stage was Little Rock, Ark. The year was 1957. Exactly 80 years after the end of the Reconstruction in the South, federal troops marched into a Southern city again. They used bayonets to disperse crowds around Central High School. And they escorted Negro children into classrooms.

Elsewhere in the South, however, the barriers remained.

Oxford, Miss., and Tuscaloosa, Ala., were still to come.

At Oxford, two men died and scores were injured [illegible]

Negroes from registering — gerrymandering, intimidation, widely spaced meetings of registration boards, throwing out Negro applications on technicalities.

So concerted voter-registration drives began.

It is a long, slow process, but the figures for Negro registration are rising, spectacularly in some cases. In Bullock, County, Ala., there were four registered Negroes in 1961. Now there are 1,341. This, of course, is a special case.

In all probability, another factor has played a part in the Negro drive for equality, a subtle, unmeasurable factor — the new African nations.

The American Negro has seen African heads of state being received in the White House and getting the red carpet treatment from Soviet Premier Khrushchev and other powerful leaders. He has seen African diplomats speaking from the rostrum of the United Nations.

This has been a source of pride and encouragement.

But it also is a two-edged sword. "An African in a robe and turban can go into a restaurant or a hotel where I can't go," said a Negro public relations man in Washington. "How silly can segregation be? How do you think this makes me feel?"

• To a greater degree than ever before, the problem is out in the open. More people are aware of the intricacies and the injustices. More are thinking about it, seeking solutions.

• Some degree of communication between the races is being restored in the South. Communications, Southerners say, generally tended to break down after the Supreme Court decision on the schools in 1954. Now, fitfully and with difficulty, Negroes and whites in some parts of the South are sitting down together again.

• President Kennedy, in conferences with scores of Southern businessmen, clergymen and others, has sought means to desegregate many establishments. He set up a presidential committee on equal job opportunity, replacing two other such committees of the Eisenhower Administration. It is headed by Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson.

• Congress is hearing testimony on the President's package of civil rights legislation. On June 11, he asked Congress to "make a commitment it has not fully made in this century to the proposition that race has no place in American life or law."

• While the Negroes are crying for rights a Negro lawyer, Mrs. Cora T. Walker, is making speeches sharply reminding them of their responsibilities. She tells them:

"We are as much to blame for our present condition as the white majority."

Help Urged For 'Our Own'

On the political side, she says, "There are approximately one million black people in New York City. These Negroes have no restrictions on their voting rights. Yet there are only two elected Negroes in the entire city legislative government."

Of the economic situation, Mrs. Walker says, lence," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), at a news conference in Jackson, Miss. "The Negro can't win in a pitched battle with the whites. He's in the minority."

But can the Negro leaders control their followers, everywhere and at all times? Who, for example, speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

"How can anyone ask me to be nonviolent?" said a Negro war veteran. "That's like putting me back in the line in Korea and loading my rifle with blanks."

Violence begets violence and the possibility of a white counter-reaction has been noted by many observers. "If that happens," said Hodding Carter, editor of the Greenville, Miss., Delta-Democrat, "all hell will break loose."

What Raced The Clock?

During the demonstrations in Birmingham last spring, a white taxi driver said to me, "If they kill any white people, I won't ask any questions. I'll just start killin'."

The hour seems late. Is it one minute to 12 now? If so, what raced the hands of the clock?

The story is soon told.

After World War II, the first important federal government action in race relations came when President Truman ordered the end of segregation in the armed forces. He also asked Congress for strong civil rights legislation. It was not granted.

During President Eisenhower's second administration, Congress enacted civil rights bills in 1957 and 1960. Using these laws, the administration filed 10 suits on behalf of Negroes' voting rights in the South.

The historic year, however, in the long and anguished struggle over civil rights, was 1954. The states.

Defiance – Alabama's Wallace

A climactic point of this stage was Little Rock, Ark. The year was 1957. Exactly 80 years after the end of the Reconstruction in the South, federal troops marched into a Southern city again. They used bayonets to disperse crowds around Central High School. And they escorted Negro children into classrooms.

Elsewhere in the South, however, the barriers remained.

Oxford, Miss., and Tuscaloosa, Ala., were still to come.

At Oxford, two men died and scores were injured when a Negro, James H. Meredith, enrolled in the University of Mississippi. Again, federal troops marched, bivouacking on the campus.

Jubilance Evaporates

At Tuscaloosa, Gov. George C. Wallace stood in the doorway of a University of Alabama building when Justice Department officials attempted to enroll two Negroes, Vivian Malone and James Hood. A few hours later, he stepped aside when federalized units of the National Guard marched onto the campus. There was no violence.

Long before these incidents, however, the "bright-new-day" jubilance of 1954 had begun to evaporate.

Negro disappointment, as the years passed with little desegregation, turned to bitterness. "Gradualism," the token policy of slowly ending segregation, and "tokenism," permitting only a handful of Negro children in schools, offices or factories, became fighting words.

Today figures indicate that about 257,000 Negro children are attending public elementary and high schools with white students in 17 Southern and border states and the District of Columbia.

Negro leaders say this is about 8 per cent of the school-age total.

Apart from the schools, new sectors opened in the fight for civil rights.

In 1955 and 1956, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, headed by the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., boycotted segregated bus lines in Montgomery, Ala. They won.

The boycott, or "selective buying," began coming into play as a potent weapon in other parts of the South. Negro economists estimate the purchasing power of the Negro, nationally, is around $15 billion a year.

"Selective buying" has put Southern businessmen in a vise. If they integrate some facilities after a Negro boycott, they may be hit by a white boycott.

Along with the boycott came the sit-in, or the kneel-in. Maneuvers were pioneered by the Committee on Racial Equality, which was founded in 1942 at the University of Chicago. It obtained a foothold in the South with the sit-in of 1960.

Registration Slow Process

Parallel with action on these fronts, the Negroes began concentrating their efforts in another supremely important field — voter registration. Another Negro organization, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee ("SNICK") has been active in this work.

The Justice Department has assisted. Since 1961, it has filed 29 suits against officials for refusing to register qualified Negroes. About 50 per cent of these suits have been won.

The Southern Regional Council estimates there are 5,045,000 Negroes of voting age in 11 Southern and border states. About one-fourth, 1,344,000, are registered.

Many tactics have been used to discourage

The American Negro has seen African heads of state being received in the White House and getting the red carpet treatment from Soviet Premier Khrushchev and other powerful leaders. He has seen African diplomats speaking from the rostrum of the United Nations.

This has been a source of pride and encouragement.

But it also is a two-edged sword. "An African in a robe and turban can go into a restaurant or a hotel where I can't go," said a Negro public relations man in Washington. "How silly can segregation be? How do you think this makes me feel?"

Then came another catalyst — Birmingham.

Last spring, Negroes there demonstrated in the streets for desegregation. So many were arrested that the jails overflowed.

Police dogs and fire hoses were used to disperse the crowds. It was not the first time the dogs had been used in Birmingham. The first time was against white men, rioting around "freedom riders" at a bus station. Nor, of course, was Birmingham the only city to use dogs.

Nevertheless, photographs of dogs leaping toward Negroes went around the globe.

Violence In North

For some resson, Birmingham appears to have dramatized the Negro struggle more than any other incident.

Almost overnight Negro demonstrations erupted in the North. Violence flared in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and other Northern cities.

In the North, Negro demands focus mainly on jobs and housing. Negro unemployment is high, more than double white employment. Labor unions have been accused of discriminating against Negroes. Negro leaders are demanding that a certain quota of Negroes shall be employed on given projects and even in restaurants.

In New York City, to dramatize these and other demands, Negroes entered the offices of Gov. Nelson Rockefeller and stayed for days in a sit-in. They staged another in City Hall.

Another recent development has been a unifying move among seven Negro organizations, some of which had been sniping at each other. They were the NAACP, CORE, SCLS, "SNICK," the National Urban League, the National Council of Negro Women and the Legal Defense and Education Fund of the NAACP, a separately incorporated organization.

The coalition takes the name Council for United Civil Rights Leadership.

"Our primary concern is to eliminate violence," a spokesman said. "We want to provide a cadre of experienced Negro leaders who will prevent things from getting out of hand and keep irresponsible elements from turning to violence."

Distinctly separate from these groups are the Black Muslims. They demand not integration, but total segregation on their own terms. They want the federal government to set aside territory in which they propose to set up a Negro state.

Their leader, Muhammad Elijah, lives in Phoenix, Ariz. In answer to the question of whether the "Muslims" hate white people, he said:

"The Bible teaches us to love good and to hate evil. I can't love him (the white) because he is the very essence of evil."

Positive Moves

In the vast, complicated and potentially dangerous picture of the racial struggle today, what are the positive sides? The principal ones would seem to be these:

Negro lawyer, Mrs. Cora T. Walker, is making speeches sharply reminding them of their responsibilities. She tells them:

"We are as much to blame for our present condition as the white majority."

Help Urged For 'Our Own'

On the political side, she says, "There are approximately one million black people in New York City. These Negroes have no restrictions on their voting rights. Yet there are only two elected Negroes in the entire city legislative government."

Of the economic situation, Mrs. Walker says, "In Harlem alone, Negroes spend $150 million a year on automobiles, $80 million on liquor, $75 million on wigs and hair pieces, $100 million on playing the numbers. More than 90 per cent of the businesses in our ghettos are owned, controlled and managed by whites outside of the community. We give minimum support to our own who are in businesses or professions."

Of some social facts, she says, "We now are the major statistic in juvenile delinquency, dope addiction, crime, and school drop-outs. Is this why 75 per cent of the out-of-wedlock children are born of our race?"

Mrs. Walker suggests that Negroes should do more to help each other. "Isn't it our responsibility," she asks, "to take the initiative to secure the needs of our underprivileged?"

She says she has never had an adverse reaction from Negro audiences. "On the contrary, there have been more than 500 requests for reprints of these speeches."

Nearly 72 years ago, on Aug. 19, 1891, the New York Mail & Express published a pathetic little item. It said some Negro clergymen had met to discuss means of obtaining "better opportunities" for their people.

Today, the Negro drive is for fully equal opportunity, for everything America offers every citizen.

Progress – Mississippi's Meredith

The Mobile Press Register
MOBILE, ALA.
SUN. 89,891 PAGE ONE CERTIFIED
AUG 1 1 1963

Legion Asks ABLE Probe

The executive committee of Lamar Y. McLeod Post No. 3 of the American Legion at Mobile entered the controversy over the local organization known as "ABLE" Saturday with an announcement by Post Comdr. Peter V. Crolich Jr. that information purportedly relating to ABLE will be presented at a general Legion membership meeting.

Crolich said the Legion executive committee feels that an investigation should be made as to the "relationship" between ABLE and the Southern Regional Council of Atlanta, Ga.

The Legion's entry into the situation followed public criticism of ABLE by Gov. George C. Wallace in a statement Friday.

"ABLE" is the name commonly used for an organization incorporated at Mobile as Alabamians Behind Local Education with the

(Page 6, Col. 5, LEGION)

Voting

(Continued From Page One)

the polls," Koury said. "In Chicago payoffs were made from automobiles; in Wilkes-Barre, Pa., pages were missing from registration books; in Little Rock, the 1956 ballot listed 169 elective offices to be filled; in 1960, Denver voters decided seven proposed constitutional amendments and 95 candidates for 45 offices," Koury said in an interview.

Koury's plan would combine mechanical, legal and moral obstacles to tampering with the ballot.

Greatly simplified, this is how it would work: The voter would receive his ballot on election day. At the vote center, the data-processing machine would verify the ballot—possible through a thumb print—and check whether the voter was registered. It then would tally the vote and prepare a receipt. Any faulty ballot would be rejected and reviewed for machine error, voter error or illegal voting. As Koury envisions it, the marked ballot would reveal only to the machine how the vote was cast.

"In view of the system's potential for boosting voter participation, the percentage of wrongdoing that might afflict the mail ballot method, even on an aggravated basis, could easily be lower than the present system," he says.

Koury, 50, is a consultant to management on labor relations in addition to his law practice.

ARKANSAS DEMOCRAT
LITTLE ROCK, ARK.
D. 84,691 S. 103,346

AUG 1 1 1963

Negro Equalit

Covers Entire

(Editor's Note: Caught in the turmoil of a summer of bitter racial discord, Americans find it difficult at times to assess the dimensions of the crisis, to know what has been gained or lost and where we are heading now. Here, in the last of a special series of Associated Press articles on the integration struggle, is a report by a correspondent who has covered it closely. It sums up the situation to date and looks at changes coming.)

By RELMAN MORIN

NEW YORK (AP) — The Negro drive for full equality has reached the dimensions of a national convulsion.

It wracks the whole United States, not just the Southern states. It is breaching the invisible racial barriers of the North no less than the visible walls in the South, shattering the complacency of one region, defeating the slowdown strategy of the other.

"Something's got a-hold of me," the Negro is chanting. "We shall overcome," is his anthem.

His movement is in the streets, the courts, the halls of Congress.

It touches schools and employment practices, a seat at a lunch counter and a home in a better neighborhood, the right to vote and the right to worship in any church, the right to sit in any public park and to read a book in any public library — in short, the rights of an American citizen and access to equal opportunity.

Starting as non-violent, his campaign has engendered violence. The blood of both races has been spilled. No one can say whether more will flow, or where, or how much.

"We will advise our people not to use violence," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, at a news conference in Jackson, Miss. "The Negro can't win in a pitched battle with the whites. He's in the minority."

But can the Negro leaders control their followers, everywhere and at all times? Who, for example, speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

Violence begets violence and the possibility of a white counter-reaction has been noted by many observers.

During the demonstrations in Birmingham last spring, a white taxi driver said to me, "If they kill any white people, I won't ask any questions. I'll just start kill-sectors opened in the fight for civil rights.

In 1955 and 1956, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, headed by Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., boycotted segregated bus lines in Montgomery, Ala. They won.

The boycott, or "selective buying," as the Negro leaders prefer to say, began coming into play as a potent weapon.

Then came the "sit-in," the tactic of simply sitting quietly in a restaurant, seeking service. Or the "kneel-in," crowds of Negroes praying on the steps of a public building or in a main street, stopping traffic.

These maneuvers were pioneered by the Committee on Racial Equality which was founded in 1942 at the University of Chicago. It obtained a foothold in the South with the "sit-in" of 1960.

Parallel with action on these fronts, the Negroes began concentrating their efforts in another field — voter registration. Another Negro organization, the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee, has been active in this work.

The Justice Department has assisted. Since 1961, it has filed 29 suits against officials for refusing to register qualified Negroes. About 50 per cent of these suits have been won.

The Southern Regional Council estimated there are 5,045,000 Negroes of voting age in 11 Southern and border states. About one-fourth, some 1,344,000, are registered.

But the figures for Negro registration are rising, spectacularly in some cases. In Bullock County, Ala., there were four registered Negroes in 1961. Now there are 1,341.

In all probability, another factor has played a part in the Negro drive for equality, a subtle, unmeasurable factor — the new African nations.

The American Negro has seen African heads of state being received in the White House and getting the red-carpet treatment from Soviet Premier Khrushchev and other powerful leaders. He has seen African diplomats speaking from the rostrum of the United Nations.

This has been a source of pride

ARKANSAS DEMOCRAT
LITTLE ROCK, ARK.
D. 84 691 S. 103,346

AUG 1 1 1963

Negro Equality Drive Covers Entire Nation

(Editor's Note: Caught in the turmoil of a summer of bitter racial discord, Americans find it difficult at times to assess the dimensions of the crisis, to know what has been gained or lost and where we are heading now. Here, in the last of a special series of Associated Press articles on the integration struggle, is a report by a correspondent who has covered it closely. It sums up the situation to date and looks at changes coming.)

By RELMAN MORIN

NEW YORK (AP) — The Negro drive for full equality has reached the dimensions of a national convulsion.

It wracks the whole United States, not just the Southern states. It is breaching the invisible racial barriers of the North no less than the visible walls in the South, shattering the complacency of one region, defeating the slowdown strategy of the other.

"Something's got a-hold of me," the Negro is chanting. "We shall overcome," is his anthem.

His movement is in the streets, the courts, the halls of Congress.

It touches schools and employment practices, a seat at a lunch counter and a home in a better neighborhood, the right to vote and the right to worship in any church, the right to sit in any public park and to read a book in any public library — in short, the rights of an American citizen and access to equal opportunity.

Starting as non-violent, his campaign has engendered violence. The blood of both races has been spilled. No one can say whether more will flow, or where, or how much.

"We will advise our people not to use violence," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, at a news conference in Jackson, Miss. "The Negro can't win in a pitched battle with the whites. He's in the minority."

But can the Negro leaders control their followers, everywhere and at all times? Who, for example, speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

Violence begets violence and the possibility of a white counter-reaction has been noted by many observers.

During the demonstrations in Birmingham last spring, a white taxi driver said to me, "If they kill any white people, I won't ask any questions. I'll just start kill-sectors opened in the fight for civil rights.

In 1955 and 1956, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, headed by Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., boycotted segregated bus lines in Montgomery, Ala. They won.

The boycott, or "selective buying," as the Negro leaders prefer to say, began coming into play as a potent weapon.

Then came the "sit-in," the tactic of simply sitting quietly in a restaurant, seeking service. Or the "kneel-in," crowds of Negroes praying on the steps of a public building or in a main street, stopping traffic.

These maneuvers were pioneered by the Committee on Racial Equality which was founded in 1942 at the University of Chicago. It obtained a foothold in the South with the "sit-in" of 1960.

Parallel with action on these fronts, the Negroes began concentrating their efforts in another field — voter registration. Another Negro organization, the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee, has been active in this work.

The Justice Department has assisted. Since 1961, it has filed 29 suits against officials for refusing to register qualified Negroes. About 50 per cent of these suits have been won.

The Southern Regional Council estimated there are 5,045,000 Negroes of voting age in 11 Southern and border states. About one-fourth, some 1,344,000, are registered.

But the figures for Negro registration are rising, spectacularly in some cases. In Bullock County, Ala., there were four registered Negroes in 1961. Now there are 1,341.

In all probability, another factor has played a part in the Negro drive for equality, a subtle, unmeasurable factor — the new African nations.

The American Negro has seen African heads of state being received in the White House and getting the red-carpet treatment from Soviet Premier Khrushchev and other powerful leaders. He has seen African diplomats speaking from the rostrum of the United Nations.

This has been a source of pride total segregation on their own terms. They want the federal government to set aside territory in which they propose to set up a Negro state.

In the vast, complicated and potentially dangerous picture of the racial struggle today, what are the positive sides? The principal ones would seem to be these:

1. To a greater degree than ever before, the problem is out in the open. More people, especially in the North but in the South, too, are aware of the intricacies and the injustices. More are thinking about it, seeking solutions.

2. Some degree of communication between the races is being restored in the South. Communications, Southerners say, generally tended to break down after the Supreme Court decision on the schools in 1954. Now, fitfully and with difficulty, Negroes and whites in some parts of the South are sitting down together again.

3. President Kennedy, in conferences with scores of Southern businessmen, clergymen and others, has sought means to desegregate many establishments. He set up a presidential committee on equal job opportunity, replacing two other such committees of the Eisenhower administration.

4. Congress is hearing testimony on the President's package of civil rights legislation. On June 11, he asked Congress to "make a commitment it has not fully made in this century to the proposition that race has no place in American life or law." Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy told the House Judiciary Committee, "This bill before you today embodies that commitment."

5. While the Negroes are crying for rights, a Negro lawyer, Mrs. Cora T. Walker, is making speeches sharply reminding them of their responsibilities. She tells them:

"We are as much to blame for our present condition as the white majority."

On the political side, she said, "There are approximately 1 million black people in New York City. These Negroes have no restrictions on their voting rights

But can the Negro leaders control their followers, everywhere and at all times? Who, for example, speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

Violence begets violence and the possibility of a white counter-reaction has been noted by many observers.

During the demonstrations in Birmingham last spring, a white taxi driver said to me, "If they kill any white people, I won't ask any questions. I'll just start killin'."

The hour seems late. Is it one minute to 12 now? If so, what raced the hands of the clock?

The story is soon told.

After World War II, the first important federal government action in race relations came when President Truman ordered the end of segregation in the armed forces. He also asked Congress for strong civil rights legislation. It was not granted.

During President Eisenhower's second administration, Congress enacted civil rights bills in 1957 and 1960. Using these laws, the administration filed 10 suits on behalf of Negroes' voting rights in the South.

The historic year, however, in the long and anguished struggle over civil rights, was 1954. The U.S. Supreme Court struck down, as unconstitutional, the doctrine of "separate-but-equal" in public schools. Segregation had been a legal fact for 58 years, based on a decision of the Supreme Court in 1896. Now, the court ordered the schools to be desegregated "with all deliberate speed."

Negroes and their white sympathizers exulted.

But the segregationist, eyeing that phrase, "with all deliberate speed," saw an escape hatch. He determined to resist as long as possible. And he did.

Mob violence exploded in Southern and border states.

A climactic point of this stage was Little Rock. The year was 1957. Exactly 80 years after the end of the Reconstruction in the South, federal troops marched into a Southern city again. They used bayonets to disperse crowds around Central High School. And they escorted Negro children into classrooms.

Elsewhere in the South, however, the barriers remained.

Oxford, Miss., and Tuscaloosa, Ala., were still to come.

At Oxford, two men died and scores were injured when a Negro, James H. Meredith, enrolled in the University of Mississippi. Again, federal troops marched, bivouacing on the campus.

At Tuscaloosa, Gov. George C. Wallace stood in the doorway of a University of Alabama building when Justice Department officials attempted to enroll two Negroes, Vivian Malone and James Hood. A few hours later, he stepped aside when federalized units of the National Guard marched onto the campus. There was no violence.

Long before these incidents, however, the "bright-new-day" jubilance of 1954 had begun to evaporate.

Negro disappointment, as the years passed with little desegregation, turned to bitterness. "Gradualism," the policy of slowly ending segregation, and "tokenism," permitting only a handful of Negro children in schools, offices or factories, became fighting words.

Today, nearly 10 years after the Supreme Court decision, figures compiled by the Southern Education Reporting Service indicate that about 257,000 Negro children are attending public elementary and high schools with white students in 17 Southern and border states and the District of Columbia.

Negro leaders say this is about 8 per cent of the school-age total.

Apart from the schools, new factor has played a part in the Negro drive for equality, a subtle, unmeasurable factor — the new African nations.

The American Negro has seen African heads of state being received in the White House and getting the red-carpet treatment from Soviet Premier Khrushchev and other powerful leaders. He has seen African diplomats speaking from the rostrum of the United Nations.

This has been a source of pride and encouragement.

But it also is a two-edged sword. "An African in a robe and turban can go into a restaurant or a hotel where I can't go," said a Negro public relations man in Washington. "How silly can segregation be? How do you think this makes me feel?"

Then came another catalyst — Birmingham.

Last spring, Negroes there demonstrated in the streets for desegregation of some facilities in downtown stores and the formation of a permanent biracial committee to handle racial problems. So many were arrested that the jails overflowed.

Police dogs and fire hoses were used to disperse the crowds. It was not the first time the dogs had been used in Birmingham. The first time was against white men, rioting around "freedom riders" at a bus station. Nor, of course, was Birmingham the only city to use dogs.

Nevertheless, photographs of dogs leaping toward Negroes went around the globe.

For some reason, Birmingham appears to have dramatized the Negro struggle more than any other incident.

Almost overnight after Birmingham, too, Negro demonstrations erupted in the North. Violence flared in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and other northern cities.

In the North, Negro demands focus mainly on jobs and housing. Negro unemployment is high, more than double white unemployment. Labor unions have been accused of discriminating against Negroes. Negro leaders are demanding that a certain quota of Negroes shall be employed on given projects, and even in restaurants.

In New York City, to dramatize these and other demands, Negroes entered the offices of Gov. Nelson Rockefeller and stayed for days in a "sit-in." They staged another in the city hall.

Another recent development has been a unifying move among seven Negro organizations, some of which had been sniping at each other. They were the NAACP, CORE, SCLC, "SNICK" the National Urban League, the National Council of Negro Women, and the legal defense and education fund of the NAACP, a separately incorporated organization.

The coalition takes the name Council for United Civil Rights Leadership.

"Our primary concern is to eliminate violence," a spokesman said. "We want to provide a cadre of experienced Negro leaders who will prevent things from getting out of hand and keep irresponsible elements from turning to violence.

Distinctly separate from these groups are the "Black Muslims." They demand, not integration, but

5. While the Negroes are crying for rights, a Negro lawyer, Mrs. Cora T. Walker, is making speeches sharply reminding them of their responsibilities. She tells them:

"We are as much to blame for our present condition as the white majority."

On the political side, she said, "There are approximately 1 million black people in New York City. These Negroes have no restrictions on their voting rights. Yet there are only two elected Negroes in the entire city legislative government."

Of the economic situation, Mrs. Walker said, "In Harlem alone, Negroes spend $150 million a year on automobiles, $80 million on liquor, $75 million on wigs and hair pieces, $100 million on playing the numbers. More than 90 per cent of the businesses in our ghettos are owned, controlled and managed by whites outside of the community. We give minimum support to our own, who are in businesses or professions."

Of some social facts, she said, "We now are the major statistic in juvenile delinquency, dope addiction, crime and school dropouts. Is this why 75 per cent of the out-of-wedlock children are born of our race?"

Mrs. Walker suggested that Negroes should do more to help each other. "Isn't it our responsibility," she asked, "to take the initiative to secure the needs of our underprivileged?"

She said she has never had an adverse reaction from Negro audiences. "On the contrary, there have been more than 500 requests for reprints of these speeches."

A similar position was taken recently by another minority group, the "Nisei," or American-born Japanese. In San Francisco, Howard Imazeki, editor of the newspaper, Hobukei Mainichi, said in an editorial:

"We have yet to hear any Negro voices blaming themselves for their social maladjustment.

"What we are trying to say most sincerely here is that the Negro leaders should do a little soul-searching of their own."

Nearly 72 years ago, on Aug. 19, 1891, the New York Mail & Express published a pathetic little item. It said some Negro clergymen had met to discuss means of obtaining "better opportunities" for their people.

Today, the Negro drive is for fully equal opportunity, for everything America offers every citizen.

ATLANTA, GA.
WORLD
D. 29,800

PAGE ONE
CERTIFIED
(N)

AUG 11 1963

Regional Council Denies Wallace's "Red" Taint

MONTGOMERY — (UPI) — Gov. George Wallace said Friday he was informed a Mobile organization was led by representatives of the Southern Regional Council, Inc., of Atlanta which had Communist-front ties.

The statement drew a strong denial from the SRC in Atlanta. Wallace said he was "distrubed by the activities of the so-called 'Able' organization in Mobile," and said the purpose of the group "in my judgement is the full integration of the schools of Mobile and Mobile County."

"'Able' is an organization led by representatives of the Southern Regional Council Inc. of Atlanta, Ga.," Wallace said. "I am informed that this organization has left wing and Communist-front organization ties."

DUNBAR REPLIES

Leslie Dunbar, executive director of the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta said "it (Able) is in no shape or form under our leadership. They are leading themselves. The only connection with Southern Regional Council was at the request of Able, we sent consultants over to talk with them and advise them about organizing.

"Able is a local group made up of local people from Mobile. Able is the same kind of organization that Hope was in Atlanta, the Women's Emergency Committee was in Little Rock or any number of similar groups in other places. It was formed for exactly the same purpose and that is to help assure peaceful orderly school desegregation in Mobile."

Regarding Wallace's charges concerning the SRC, Dunbar said "Gov. Wallace is entirely misinformed about the Southern Regional Council, which has never had any connections with Comunist fronts or with Citizens Councils or with Ku Klux Klans.

Gov. Wallace is advising the people of Mobile to do something which he himself recklessly is not doing—that is to investigate the facts.

MILWAUKEE JOURNAL

D. 373,657 S. 561,118

AUG 1 1 1963

The Deepening Crisis

Racial Tensions Mounted Swiftly, Outlook Is Murky, Writer Finds

Negroes' Civil Rights Drive Has Brought Bloodshed; More Could Lie Ahead

By RELMAN MORIN
Of the Associated Press

The Negro drive for full equality has reached the dimensions of a national convulsion.

It touches schools and employment practices, a seat at a lunch counter and a home in a better neighborhood, the right to vote and the right to worship in any church, the right to sit in any public park and to read a book in any public library — in short, the rights of an American citizen and access to equal opportunity.

The blood of both ages has been spilled. No one can say whether more will flow, or where, or how much.

"How can anyone ask me to be nonviolent?" said a Negro war veteran. "That's like putting me back in the line in Korea and loading my rifle with blanks."

Counteraction Possible

Violence begets violence and the possibility of a white counterreaction has been noted by many observers.

"If that happens," said Hodding Carter, editor of the Greenville (Miss.) Delta-Democrat, "all hell will break loose."

In the demonstrations in Birmingham last spring, a white taxi driver said to me: "If they kill any white people, I won't ask any questions. I'll just start killin'."

The hour seems late. What pushed the hands of the clock along so fast?

After World War II, the first segregation, turned to bitterness. "Gradualism," the policy of slowly ending segregation, and "tokenism," permitting only a handful of Negro children in schools, offices or factories, became fighting words.

New Sectors Opened

Apart from the schools, new sectors opened in the fight for civil rights.

In 1955 and 1956, the Southern Christian Leadership conference, headed by Dr. Martin Luther King, boycotted segregated bus lines in Montgomery, Ala. They won.

The boycott, or "selective buying," as the Negro leaders prefer to say, began coming into play as a potent weapon in other parts of the south.

"Selective buying" has put southern businessmen in a vise. If they integrate some facilities after a Negro boycott, they may be hit by a white boycott.

Along with the boycott came the "sit-in," the tactic of simply sitting quietly in a restaurant, seeking service. Or the "kneel-in," crowds of Negroes praying on the steps of a public building or in a main street, stopping traffic.

These maneuvers were pioneered by the Congress on Racial Equality (CORE) which was founded in 1942 at the University of Chicago. It obtained a foothold in the south with the "sit-in" of 1960.

Voter Registration

Parallel with action on these fronts, the Negroes began concentrating their efforts in another supremely important field — voter registration. Another Negro organization, the Student Nonviolent Co-ordinating committee, has been active in this work.

The justice department has assisted. Since 1961, it has filed 29 suits against officials for refusing to register qualified Negroes. About 50% of these suits intricacies and the injustices. More are thinking about it, seeking solutions.

Some degree of communication between the races is being restored in the south. Communications, southerners say, generally tended to break down after the supreme court decision on the schools in 1954. Now, fitfully and with difficulty, Negroes and whites in some parts of the south are sitting down together again.

President Kennedy, in conferences with scores of southern businessmen, clergymen and others, has sought means to desegregate many establishments. He set up a presidential committee on equal job opportunity, replacing two other such committees of the Eisenhower administration. It is headed by Vice-President Johnson.

Congress is hearing testimony on the president's package of civil rights legislation. On June 11, he asked congress to "make a commitment it has not fully made in this century to the proposition that race has no place in American life or law." Atty. Gen Robert F. Kennedy told the house judiciary committee: "This bill before you today embodies that commitment."

While the Negroes are crying for rights, a Negro lawyer, Mrs. Cora T. Walker, is making speeches sharply reminding them of their responsibilities. She tells them: "We are as much to blame for our present condition as the white majority." Other Negro leaders are echoing her words.

Nearly 72 years ago, on Aug. 19, 1891, the New York Mail & Express published a small item. It said some Negro clergymen had met to discuss means of obtaining "better opportunities" for their people.

Today, the Negro drive is for fully equal the possibility of a white counterreaction has been noted by many observers.

Yard

"If that happens," said Hodding Carter, editor of the Greenville (Miss.) Delta-Democrat, "all hell will break loose."

In the demonstrations in Birmingham last spring, a white taxi driver said to me: "If they kill any white people, I won't ask any questions. I'll just start killin'."

The hour seems late. What pushed the hands of the clock along so fast?

After World War II, the first important federal government action in race relations came when President Truman ordered the end of segregation in the armed forces. He also asked congress for strong civil rights legislation. It was not granted.

In President Eisenhower's second administration, congress enacted civil rights bills in 1957 and 1960. Using these laws, the administration filed 10 suits on behalf of Negroes' voting rights in the south.

1954 Was Historic Year

The historic year in the long and anguished struggle over civil rights was 1954, however. The United States supreme court struck down as unconstitutional the doctrine of "separate but equal" in public schools. It ordered the schools to be desegregated "with all deliberate speed."

The segregationist, eying the phrase "with all deliberate speed," saw an escape hatch. He determined to resist as long as possible. And he did.

Mob violence exploded in southern and border states.

A climactic point of this stage was Little Rock, Ark., in 1957. Exactly 80 years after the end of the reconstruction in the south, federal troops used bayonets to disperse crowds around Central high school. They escorted Negro children into classrooms.

Two Died at Oxford

At Oxford, Miss., two men died and scores were injured in 1962 when a Negro, James H. Meredith, enrolled in the University of Mississippi. Again, federal troops marched, bivouacing on the campus.

This year, at Tuscaloosa, Gov. George C. Wallace stood in the doorway of a University of Alabama building when justice department officials attempted to enroll two Negroes, Vivian Malone and James Hood. A few hours later, he stepped aside when federalized units of the national guard marched onto the campus. There was no violence.

Long before these incidents, however, the "bright new day" jubilance of 1954 had begun to evaporate.

Negro disappointment, as the years passed with little desegtained a foothold in the south with the "sit-in" of 1960.

Voter Registration

Parallel with action on these fronts, the Negroes began concentrating their efforts in another supremely important field — voter registration. Another Negro organization, the Student Nonviolent Co-ordinating committee, has been active in this work.

The justice department has assisted. Since 1961, it has filed 29 suits against officials for refusing to register qualified Negroes. About 50% of these suits have been won.

The Southern Regional council estimates that there are 5,045,000 Negroes of voting age in 11 southern and border states. About one-fourth, some 1,344,000, are registered.

In all probability, another factor has played a part in the Negro drive for equality, a subtle, unmeasurable factor — the new African nations.

The American Negro has seen African heads of state being received in the White House and getting the red carpet treatment from Soviet Premier Khrushchev and other powerful leaders. He has seen African diplomats speaking from the rostrum of the United Nations.

Two Edged Sword

This has been a source of pride and encouragement.

But it also is a two edged sword.

"An African in a robe and turban can go into a restaurant or a hotel where I can't go," said a Negro public relations man in Washington. "How silly can segregation be? How do you think this makes me feel?"

Then came another catalyst —Birmingham.

Last spring, Negroes there demonstrated. Police dogs and fire hoses were used to disperse the crowds. It was not the first time the dogs had been used in Birmingham. The first time was against white men, rioting around freedom riders at a bus station. Nor, of course, was Birmingham the only city to use dogs.

Nevertheless, photographs of dogs leaping toward Negroes went around the world.

Birmingham appears to have dramatized the Negro struggle more than any other incident.

Violence in North

Almost overnight, violence flared in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and other northern cities.

In the racial struggle today, what are the positive sides? The principal ones would seem to be these:

To a greater degree than ever before, the problem is out in the open. More people, especially in the north but in the south, too, are aware of the ing speeches sharply reminding them of their responsibilities. She tells them: "We are as much to blame for our present condition as the white majority." Other Negro leaders are echoing her words.

Nearly 72 years ago, on Aug. 19, 1891, the New York Mail & Express published a small item. It said some Negro clergymen had met to discuss means of obtaining "better opportunities" for their people.

Today, the Negro drive is for fully equal opportunity, for everything America offers every citizen.

Trenton Sunday
Times Advertiser
TRENTON, N. J.
SUN. 71,397
PAGE ONE
CERTIFIED
AUG 1 1 1963

Deepening Crisis—13

'Something's Got A

Editor's Note: In this last of a special series on the integration struggle which has rocked America's conscience this crucial Summer, Pulitzer Prize-winner Relman Morin tries to fathom what's ahead.

By Relman Morin

NEW YORK (AP)—The Negro drive for full equality has reached the dimensions of a national convulsion.

It wracks the whole United States, not just the Southern states. It is breaching the invisible racial barriers of the North no less than the visible walls in the South, shattering the complacency of one region, defeating the slow-down strategy of the other.

Something's got a hold of me," the Negro is chanting. "We shall overcome," is his anthem.

His movement is in the streets, the courts, the halls of Congress.

It touches schools and employment practices, a seat at a lunch counter and a home in a better neighborhood, the right to vote and the right to worship in any church, the right to sit in any public park and to read a book in any public library—in short, the rights of an American citizen and access to equal opportunity.

Stress Nonviolence

Starting as nonviolent, his campaign has engendered violence. The blood of both races has been spilled. No one can say whether more will flow, or where, or how much.

"We will advise our people not to use violence," said Roy 'Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, at a news co

Miss. "The pitched batt
He's in the

But can th
trol their f and at all ample, spea giant Negro
York City?

"How can nonviolent?
veteran. " back in th loading my Violence possibility reaction h observers.

Hodding
Greenville crat, "all

During

'We Shall Overcome' Rocks T

(Continued from Page 1, Part 1)

Negroes and their white sympathizers exulted.

But the segregationist, eying that phrase, "with all deliberate speed," saw an escape hatch. He determined to resist as long as possible. And he did.

Mob violence exploded in Southern and border states.

A climactic point of this stage was Little Rock, Ark. The year was 1957. Exactly 80 years after the end of the reconstruction in the South, federal troops marched into a Southern city again. They used bayonets to disperse crowds around Central High School. And they escorted Negro children into classrooms.

Elsewhere in the South, however, the barriers remained.

Oxford, Miss., and Tuscaloosa, Ala., were still to come.

At Oxford, two men died and scores were injured when a Negro, James H. Meredith, enrolled in the University of Mississippi. Again, federal troops marched, bivouacing on the campus.

"New Day" Fades Away

At Tuscaloosa, Gov. George C. Wallace stood in the doorway of a University of Alabama building when Justice Department officials attempted to enroll two Negroes, Vivian Maline and James Hood. A few hours later, he stepped aside when federalized units of the National Guard marched onto the campus. There was no violence.

Long before these incidents, however, the "bright-new-day" jubilance of 1954 had begun to evaporate.

Negro disappointment, as the years passed with little desegregation, turned to bitterness. "Gradualism," the policy of slowly ending segregation, and "tokenism," permitting only a handful of Negro children in schools, offices or factories, became fighting words.

Today, nearly 10 years after the Supreme Court decision, figures compiled by the Southern Education Reporting Service indicate that about 257,000 Negro children are attending public elementary and high schools with white students in 17 Southern and border states and the District of Columbia.

Negro leaders say this is about 8 per cent of the school-age total.

Apart from the schools, new sectors opened in the fight for civil rights.

Merchants In Vise

In 1955 and 1956, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, headed by the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., boycotted segregated bus lines in Montgomery, Ala. They won.

The boycott, or "selective buying," as the Negro leaders prefer to say, began coming into play as a potent weapon in other parts of the South. Negro economists estimate that the purchasing power of the Negro, nationally, is around $15 billion a year.

"Selective buying" has put Southern businessmen in a vise. If they integrate some facilities after a Negro boycott, they may be hit by a white boycott.

Along with the boycott came the "sit-in," the tactic of simply sitting quietly in a restaurant, seeking service. Or the "kneel-in," crowds of Negroes praying on the steps of a public building or in a main street, stopping traffic.

These maneuvers were pioneered by the Congress of Racial Equality, which was founded in 1942 at the University of Chicago. It obtained a foothold in the South with the sit-ins of 1960.

Parallel with action on these fronts, the Negroes began concentrating their efforts in another supremely important field — voter registration. Another Negro organization, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee — "SNICK"—has been active in this work.

The Justice Department has assisted. Since 1961, it has filed 29 suits against officials for refusing to register qualified Negroes. About 50 per cent of these suits have been won.

Negro Votes On The Rise

The Southern Regional Council estimates there are 5,045,000 Negroes of voting age in 11 Southern and border states. About one-fourth, some 1,344,000, are registered.

Many tactics have been used to discourage Negroes from registering — gerrymandering, intimidation, widely-spaced meetings of registration boards, throwing out Negro applications on technicalities.

So concerted voter-registration drives began. Students went through Negro communities, ringing doorbells. Officials stationed themselves in public buildings in the South, buttonholing every Negro who came in, whatever his business, and urging him to register, there and then. Voter "clinics" were set up to instruct Negroes in filling out the application forms, and in meeitng the technicalities.

It is a long, slow process, but the figures for Negro registration are rising, spectacularly in some cases. In Bullock County, Alabama, there were four registered Negroes in 1961. Now there are 1,341. This, of course, is a special case.

Of the registration drives, Bishop George W. Barber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign

Scenes like this one in Birmingham, Ala., this Spring arou tion. Birmingham has become the symbol of this year' America's race relations.

Rocks The Conscience Of A Nation

groes in filling out the application forms, and in meeitng the technicalities.

It is a long, slow process, but the figures for Negro registration are rising, spectacularly in some cases. In Bullock County, Alabama, there were four registered Negroes in 1961. Now there are 1,341. This, of course, is a special case.

Of the registration drives, Bishop George W. Barber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible Negro voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

New Africa Plays A Part

In all probability, another factor has played a part in the Negro drive for equality, a subtle, unmeasurable factor—the new African nations.

The American Negro has seen African heads of state being received in the White House and getting the red carpet treatment from Soviet Premier Khrushchev and other powerful leaders. He has seen African diplomats speaking from the rostrum of the United Nations.

This has been a source of pride and encouragement.

But it also is a two-edged sword. "An African in a robe and turban can go into a restaurant or a hotel where I can't go," said a Negro public relations man in Washington. "How silly can segregation be? How do you think this makes me feel?"

Then came another catalyst—Birmingham.

Last spring, Negroes there demonstrated in the streets for desegregation of some facilities in downtown stores and the formation of a permanent biracial committee to handle racial problems. So many were arrested that the jails overflowed.

Police dogs and fire hoses were used to disperse the crowds. It was not the first time the dogs had been used in Birmingham. The first time was against white men, rioting around "freedom riders" at a bus station. Nor, of course, was Birmingham the only city to use dogs.

Nevertheless, photographs of dogs leaping toward Negroes went around the globe.

The Symbol: Birmingham

For some reason, Birmingham appears to have dramatized the Negro struggle more than any other incident.

"Birmingham engineered the revolution that began in the spring of 1963," Martin Ochs, editor of the Chattanooga Times, said in a recent speech at the University of Wisconsin.

Fear of violence and economic trouble has fostered a "mood of reconciliation" toward racial integration in the south, Ochs said.

Almost overnight after Birmingham, too, Negro demonstrations erupted in the North. Violence flared in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and other Northern cities. The Los Angeles Times published a cartoon depicting two Negro figures, one in a menacing posture. It was captioned, "Integration, not intimidation."

In the North, Negro demands focus mainly on jobs and housing. Negro unemployment is high, more than double white unemployment. Labor unions have been accused of discriminating against Negroes. Negro leaders are demanding that a certain quota of Negroes shall be employed on given projects, and even in restaurants.

In New York City, to dramatize these and other demands, Negroes entered the offices of Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller and stayed for days in a sit-in. They staged another in the City Hall.

Groups Form Coalition

Another recent development has been a unifying move among seven Negro organizations, some of which had been sniping at each other. They were the NAACP, CORE, SCLC, "SNICK," the National Urban League, the National Council of Negro Women, and the Legal Defense and Education Fund of the NAACP, a separately incorporated organization.

The coalition takes the name Council for United Civil Rights Leadership.

"Our primary concern is to eliminate violence," a spokesman said. "We want to provide a cadre of experienced Negro leaders who will prevent things from getting out of hand and keep irresponsible elements from turning to violence."

In the vast, complicated and potentially dangerous picture of the racial struggle today, what are the positive sides? The principal ones would seem to be these:

1. To a greater degree than ever before, the problem is out in the open. More people, especially in the North but in the South, too, are aware of the intricacies and the injustices. More are thinking about it, seeking solutions.

2. Some degree of communication between the races is being restored in the South. Communications, Southerners say, generally tended to break down after the Supreme Court decision on the schools in 1954. Now, fitfully and with difficulty, Negroes and whites in some parts of the South are sitting down together again.

3. President Kennedy, in conferences with scores of Southern businessmen, clergymen and others, has sought means to desegregate many establishments. He set up a presidential committee on equal job opportunity, replacing two other such committees of the Eisenhower administration. It is headed by Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson.

4. Congress is hearing testimony on the President's package of civil rights legislation. On June 11, he asked Congress to "make a commitment it has not fully made in this century to the proposition that race has no place in American life or law." Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy told the House Judiciary Committee, "This bill before you today embodies that commitment."

5. While the Negroes are crying for rights, a Negro lawyer, Cora T. Walker, is making speeches sharply reminding them of their responsibilities.

She tells them: "We are as much to blame for our present condition as the white majority."

Mrs. Walker suggests that Negroes should do more to help each other. "Isn't it our responsibility," she asks, "to take the initiative to secure the needs of our underprivileged?"

A similar position was taken recently by another minority group, the Nisei, or American-born Japanese. In San Francisco, Howard Imazeki, editor of the newspaper, Hobukei Mainichi, said in an editorial:

Soul-Searching Suggested

"We have yet to hear any Negro voices blaming themselves for their social maladjustment.

"What we are trying to say most sincerely here is that the Negro leaders should do a little soul-searching of their own."

Nearly 72 years ago, on Aug. 19, 1891, the New York Mail & Express published a pathetic little item. It said some Negro clergymen had met to discuss means of obtaining "better opportunities" for their people.

Today, the Negro drive is for fully equal opportunity, for everything America offers every citizen.

Birmingham, Ala., this Spring aroused worldwide indigna- become the symbol of this year's "deepening crisis" in

The Atlanta Journal
AND
THE ATLANTA CONSTITUTION
SUN. 504,755

AUG 1 1 1963

THE DEEPENING CRISIS--NO. 13

Where Do We Go Now?

EDITOR'S NOTE—Caught in the turmoil of a summer of bitter racial discord, Americans find it difficult at times to assess the dimensions of the crisis, to know what has been gained or lost and where we are heading now. Here, in the last of a special series of Associated Press articles on the integration struggle, is a report by a correspondent who has covered it closely. It sums up the situation to date and looks at changes coming.

By RELMAN MORIN

NEW YORK, Aug. 10 (AP)—The Negro drive for full equality has reached the dimensions of a national convulsion.

It wracks the whole United States, not just the Southern states. It is breaching the invisible racial barriers of the North no less than the visible walls in the South, shattering the complacency of one region, defeating the slow-down strategy of the other.

"Something's got a-hold of me," the Negro is chanting. "We Shall Overcome" is his anthem.

His movement is in the streets, the courts, the halls of Congress.

It touches schools and employment practices, a seat at a lunch counter and a home in a better neighborhood, the right to vote and the right to worship in any church, the right to sit in any public park and to read a book in any public library—in short, the rights of an American citizen and access to equal opportunity.

Starting as nonviolent, his campaign has engendered violence. The blood of both races has been spilled. No one can say whether more will flow or where or how much.

"We will advise our people not to use violence," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), at a news conference in Jackson, Miss. "The Negro can't win in a pitched battle with the whites. He's in the minority."

BUT CAN THE Negro leaders control their followers every-

Associated Press Wirephoto

GOV. GEORGE WALLACE STANDS IN DOORWAY OF UNIVERSITY OF ALABAMA
In Tuscaloosa, Governor Is Flanked by State Policemen; His Prepared Speech on Stand

Elsewhere in the South, however, the barriers remained.

Oxford, Miss., and Tuscaloosa, Ala., were still to come.

At Oxford, two men died and scores were injured when a Negro, James H. Meredith, enrolled in the University of Mississippi. Again, federal troops marched, bivouacing on the campus.

At Tuscaloosa, Gov. George C. Wallace stood in the doorway of a University of Alabama building when Justice Department officials attempted to enroll two Negroes, Vivian Malone and James Hood. A few hours later, he stepped aside when federalized units of the National Guard marched onto the campus. There was no violence.

Long before these incidents, however, the "bright-new-day" jubilance of 1954 had begun to evaporate.

lion Negroes of voting age in 11 Southern and border states. About one fourth, some 1,344,000, are registered.

MANY TACTICS have been used to discourage Negroes from registering—gerrymandering, intimidation, widely spaced meetings of registration boards, throwing out Negro applications on technicalities.

So concerted voter registration drives began. Students went through Negro communities, ringing doorbells. Officials stationed themselves in public buildings in the South, buttonholing every Negro who came in, whatever his business, and urging him to register, there and then. Voter "clinics" were set up to instruct Negroes in filling out the application forms and in meeting the technicalities.

It is a long, slow process, but

Fear of violence and economic trouble has fostered a "mood of reconciliation" toward racial integration in the South, Ochs said.

Almost overnight after Birmingham, too, Negro demonstrations erupted in the North. Violence flared in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and other Northern cities. The Los Angeles Times published a cartoon depicting two Negro figures, one in a menacing posture. It was captioned, "Integration Not Intimidation."

In the North, Negro demands focus mainly on jobs and housing. Negro unemployment is high, more than double white unemployment. Labor unions have been accused of discriminating against Negroes. Negro leaders are demanding that a certain quota of Negroes shall be employed on given projects, seen through the window from the sidewalk.

3. President Kennedy, in conferences with scores of Southern businessmen, clergymen and others, has sought means to desegregate many establishments. He set up a presidential committee on equal job opportunity, replacing two other such committees of the Eisenhower administration. It is headed by Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson.

4. Congress is hearing testimony on the President's package of civil rights legislation. On June 11, he asked Congress to "make a commitment it has not fully made in this century to the proposition that race has no place in American life or law." Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy told the House Judiciary Committee, "This bill before you today embodies that com-ship in any church, the right to sit in any public park and to read a book in any public library—in short, the rights of an American citizen and access to equal opportunity.

Starting as nonviolent, his campaign has engendered violence. The blood of both races has been spilled. No one can say whether more will flow or where or how much.

"We will advise our people not to use violence," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), at a news conference in Jackson, Miss. "The Negro can't win in a pitched battle with the whites. He's in the minority."

BUT CAN THE Negro leaders control their followers, everywhere and at all times? Who, for example, speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

"How can anyone ask me to be nonviolent?" said a Negro war veteran. "That's like putting me back in the line in Korea and loading my rifle with blanks."

Vilence begets violence and the possibility of a white counter-reaction has been noted by many observers. "If that happens," said Hodding Carter, editor of the Greenville, Miss., Delta-Democrat, "all hell will break loose."

During the demonstrations in Birmingham last spring, a white taxi driver said to me, "If they kill any white people, I won't ask any questions. I'll just start killin'."

The hour seems late. Is it one minute to 12 now? If so, what raced the hands of the clock?

The story is soon told.

AFTER WORLD WAR II, the first important federal government action in race relations came when President Truman ordered the end of segregation in the armed forces. He also asked Congress for strong civil rights legislation. It was not granted.

During President Eisenhower's second administration, Congress enacted civil rights bills in 1957 and 1960. Using these laws, the administration filed 10 suits on behalf of Negroes' voting rights in the South.

The historic year, however, in the long and anguished struggle over civil rights, was 1954. The U.S. Supreme Court struck down, as unconstitutional, the doctrine of "separate-but-equal" in public schools. Segregation had been a legal fact for 58 years, based on a decision of the Supreme Court in 1896. Now, the court ordered the schools to be desegregated "with all deliberate speed."

Negroes and their white sympathizers exulted.

But the segregationist, eying that phrase, "with all deliberate speed," saw an escape hatch. He determined to resist as long as possible. And he did.

Mob violence exploded in Southern and border states.

A CLIMATIC point of this stage was Little Rock. The year was 1957. Exactly 80 years after the end of Reconstruction in the South, federal troops marched into a Southern city again. They used bayonets to disperse crowds around Central High School. And they escorted Negro children into classrooms.

Oxford, Miss., and Tuscaloosa, Ala., were still to come.

At Oxford, two men died and scores were injured when a Negro, James H. Meredith, enrolled in the University of Mississippi. Again, federal troops marched, bivouacing on the campus.

At Tuscaloosa, Gov. George C. Wallace stood in the doorway of a University of Alabama building when Justice Department officials attempted to enroll two Negroes, Vivian Malone and James Hood. A few hours later, he stepped aside when federalized units of the National Guard marched onto the campus. There was no violence.

Long before these incidents, however, the "bright-new-day" jubilance of 1954 had begun to evaporate.

Negro disappointment, as the years passed with little desegregation, turned to bitterness. "Gradualism," the policy of slowly ending segregation, and "tokenism," permitting only a handful of Negro children in schools, offices or factories, became fighting words.

TODAY, nearly 10 years after the Supreme Court decision, figures compiled by the Southern Education Reporting Service indicate that about 257,000 Negro children are attending public elementary and high schools with white students in 17 Southern and border saates and the District of Columbia.

Negro leaders say this is about 8 per cent of the school-age total.

Apart from the schools, new sectors opened in the fight for civil rights.

In 1955 and 1956, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), headed by Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., boycotted segregated bus lines in Montgomery. They won.

They boycott, or "selective buying," as the Negro leaders prefer to say, began coming into play as a potent weapon in other parts of the South. Negro economists estimate that the purchasing power of the Negro, nationally, is around $15 billion a year.

"Selective buying" has put Southern businessmen in a vise. If they integrate some facilities after a Negro boycott, they may be hit by a white boycott.

ALONG WITH the boycott came the "sit-in," the tactic of simply sitting quietly in a restaurant, seeking service. Or the "kneel-in," crowds of Negroes praying on the steps of a public building or in a main street, stopping traffic.

These maneuvers were pioneered by the Committee on Racial Equality (CORE), which was founded in 1942 at the University of Chicago. It obtained a foothold in the South with the "sit-in" of 1960.

Parallel with action on these fronts, the Negroes began concentrating their efforts in another supremely important field —voter registration. Another Negro organization, the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee ("SNICK") has been active in this work.

The Justice Department has assisted. Since 1961, it has filed 29 suits against officials for refusing to register qualified Negroes. About 50 per cent of these suits have been won.

The Southern Regional Council estimates there are 5.04 million Negroes in the Southern and border states. About one fourth, some 1,344,000, are registered.

MANY TACTICS have been used to discourage Negroes from registering—gerrymandering, intimidation, widely spaced meetings of registration boards, throwing out Negro applications on technicalities.

So concerted voter registration drives began. Students went through Negro communities, ringing doorbells. Officials stationed themselves in public buildings in the South, buttonholing every Negro who came in, whatever his business, and urging him to register, there and then. Voter "clinics" were set up to instruct Negroes in filling out the application forms and in meeting the technicalities.

It is a long, slow process, but the figures for Negro registration are rising, spectacularly in some cases. In Bullock County, Ala., there were four registered Negroes in 1961. Now there are 1,341. This, of course, is a special case.

Of the registration drives, Bishop George W. Barber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible Negro voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

IN ALL probability, another factor has played a part in the Negro drive for equality, a subtle, unmeasurable factor — the new African nations.

The American Negro has seen African heads of state being received in the White House and getting the red carpet treatment from Soviet Premier Khrushchev and other powerful leaders. He has seen African diplomats speaking from the rostrum of the United Nations.

This has been a source of pride and encouragement.

But it also is a two-edged sword. "An African in a robe and turban can go into a restaurant or a hotel where I can't go," said a Negro public relations man in Washington. "How silly can segregation be? How do you think this makes me feel?"

Then came another catalyst —Birmingham.

Last spring, Negroes there demonstrated in the streets for desegregation of some facilities in downtown stores and the formation of a permanent biracial committee to handle racial problems. So many were arrested that the jails overflowed.

Police dogs and fire hoses were used to disperse the crowds. It was not the first time the dogs had been used in Birmingham. The first time was against white men, rioting around "freedom riders" at a bus station. Nor, of course, was Birmingham the only city to use dogs.

Nevertheless, photographs of dogs leaping toward Negroes went around the globe.

For some reason, Birmingham appears to have dramatized the Negro struggle more than any other incident.

"BIRMINGHAM engineered the revolution that began in the spring of 1963," Martin Ochs, editor of the Chattanooga Times, said in a recent speech at the University of Wisconsin.

"Double has fostered a mood of reconciliation" toward racial integration in the South, Ochs said.

Almost overnight after Birmingham, too, Negro demonstrations erupted in the North. Violence flared in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and other Northern cities. The Los Angeles Times published a cartoon depicting two Negro figures, one in a menacing posture. It was captioned, "Integration Not Intimidation."

In the North, Negro demands focus mainly on jobs and housing. Negro unemployment is high, more than double white unemployment. Labor unions have been accused of discriminating against Negroes. Negro leaders are demanding that a certain quota of Negroes shall be employed on given projects, and even in restaurants.

In New York City, to dramatize these and other demands, Negroes entered the offices of Gov. Nelson Rockefeller and stayed for days in a "sit-in." They staged another in the city hall.

ANOTHER RECENT development has been a unifying move among seven Negro organizations, some of which had been sniping at each other. They are the NAACP, CORE, SCLC, "SNICK," National Urban League, National Council of Negro Women and Legal Defense and Education Fund of the NAACP, a separately incorporated organization.

The coalition takes the name Council for United Civil Rights Leadership.

"Our primary concern is to eliminate violence," a spokesman said. "We want to provide a cadre of experienced Negro leaders who will prevent things from getting out of hand and keep irresponsible elements from turning to violence."

Distinctly separate from these groups are the Black Muslims. They demand not integration, but total segregation on their own terms. They want the federal government to set aside territory in which they propose to set up a Negro state.

Their leader, Muhammad Elijah, lies in Phoenix, Ariz. In answer to the question of whether the Muslims hate white people, he said:

"The Bible teaches us to love good and to hate evil. I can't love him (the white) because his is the very essence of evil."

IN THE VAST, complicated and potentially dangerous picture of the racial struggle today, what are the positive sides? The principal ones would seem to be these:

1. To a greater degree than ever before, the problem is out in the open. More people, especially in the North but in the South, too, are aware of the intricacies and the injustices. More are thinking about it, seeking solutions.

2. Some degree of communication between the races is being restored in the South. Communications, Southerners say, generally tended to break down after the Supreme Court decision on the schools in 1954. Now, fitfully and with difficulty, Negroes and whites in some parts of the South are sitting down together again. One Southern newspaper publisher called such a meeting in his own plant — and deliberately placed the conference table where it could be the sidewalk.

3. President Kennedy, in conferences with scores of Southern businessmen, clergymen and others, has sought means to desegregate many establishments. He set up a presidential committee on equal job opportunity, replacing two other such committees of the Eisenhower administration. It is headed by Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson.

4. Congress is hearing testimony on the President's package of civil rights legislation. On June 11, he asked Congress to "make a commitment it has not fully made in this century to the proposition that race has no place in American life or law." Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy told the House Judiciary Committee, "This bill before you today embodies that commitment."

5. WHILE THE Negroes are crying for rights, a Negro lawyer, Mrs. Cora T. Walker, is making speeches sharply reminding them of their responsibilities. She tells them:

"We are as much to blame for our present condition as the white majority."

On the political side, she says, "There are approximately one million black people in New York City. These Negroes have no restrictions on their voting rights. Yet there are only two elected Negroes in the entire city legislative government."

Of the economic situation, Mrs. Walker says, "In Harlem alone, Negroes spend $150 million a year on automobiles, $80 million on liquor, $75 million on wigs and hair pieces, $100 million on playing the numbers. More than 90 per cent of the businesses in our ghettos are owned, controlled and managed by whites outside of the community. We give minimum support to our own, who are in businesses or professions."

Of some social facts, she says, "We now are the major statistic in juvenile delinquency, dope addiction, crime and school drop-outs. Is this why 75 per cent of the out-of-wedlock children are born of our race?"

Mrs. Walker suggests that Negroes should do more to help each other. "Isn't it our responsibility," she asks, "to take the initiative to secure the needs of our underprivileged?"

She says she never has had an adverse reaction from Negro audiences. "On the contrary, there have been more than 500 requests for reprints of these speeches."

A SIMILAR position was taken recently by another minority group, the "Nisei," or American-born Japanese. In San Francisco, Howard Imazeki, editor of the newspaper Hobukei Mainichi said in an editorial:

"We have yet to hear any Negro voices blaming themselves for their social maladjustment.

"What we are trying to say most sincerely here is that the Negro leaders should do a little soul-searching of their own."

Nearly 72 years ago, on Aug. 19, 1891, the New York Mail and Express published a pathetic little item. It said some Negro clergymen had met to discuss means of obtaining "better opportunities" for their people.

Today, the Negro drive is for fully equal opportunity, for everything America offers every citizen.

Dallas Times Herald
D. 195,987 S. 206,275
AUG 1 1 1963

THE DEEPENING CRISIS—XIII

Final Sum: 'We'll Overcome'

Editor's Note—Caught in the turmoil of a summer of bitter racial discord, Americans find it difficult at times to assess the dimensions of the crisis, to know what has been gained or lost and where we are heading now. This last of a special series of Associated Press articles on the integration struggle sums up the situation to date and looks at changes ahead.

●

By RELMAN MORIN

NEW YORK (AP)—The Negro drive for full equality has reached the dimensions of a national convulsion.

It wracks the whole United States, not just the Southern states. It is breaching the invisible racial barriers of the North no less than the visible walls in the South, shattering the complacency of one region, defeating the slow-down strategy of the other.

"Something's got a-hold of me," the Negro is chanting. "We shall overcome," is his anthem.

His movement is in the streets, the courts, the halls of Congress.

It touches schools and employment practices, a seat at a lunch counter and a home in a better neighborhood, the right to vote and the right to worship in any church, the right to sit in any public park and to read a book in any public library—in short, the rights of an American citizen and access to equal opportunity.

Starting as non-violent, his campaign has engendered violence. The blood of both races has been spilled. No one can say whether more will flow, or where, or how much.

"We will advise our people not to use violence," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), at a news conference in Jackson, Miss. "The Negro can't win in a pitched battle with the whites. He's in the minority."

But can the Negro leaders control their followers, everywhere and at all times? Who, for example, speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

Counter-Reaction

Violence begets violence and the possibility of a white counter-reaction has been noted by many observers. "If that happens," said Hodding Carter, editor of the of the Greenville, Miss., Delta-Democrat, "all hell will break loose."

The hour seems late. Is it one minute to 12 now? If so, what raced the hands of the clock?

The story is soon told.

After World War II, the first important federal government action in race relations came when President Truman ordered the end of segregation in the armed forces. He also asked Congress for strong civil rights legislation. It was not granted.

During President Eisenhower's second administration, Congress enacted civil rights bills in 1957 and 1960. Using these laws, the administration filed 10 suits on behalf of Negroes' voting rights in the South.

The historic year, however, in the long and anguished struggle over civil rights, was 1954. The U.S. Supreme Court struck down, as unconstitutional, the doctrine of "separate-but-equal" in public schools. The court ordered the schools to be desegregated "with all deliberate speed."

Negroes and their white sympathizers exulted.

But the segregationist, eying that phrase, "with all deliberate speed," saw an escape hatch. He determined to resist as long as possible, and he did. The "bright-new-day" jubilance of 1954 began to evaporate.

Negro disappointment, as the years passed with little desegregation, turned to bitterness. "Gradualism," the policy of slowly ending segregation, and "tokenism," permitting only a handful of Negro children in schools, offices or factories, became fighting words.

Today, nearly 10 years after the Supreme Court decision, figures compiled by the Southern Education Reporting Service indicate that about 257,000 Negro children are attending public elementary and high schools with white students in 17 Southern and border states and the District of Columbia.

Negro leaders say this is about 8 per cent of the school-age total.

Apart from the schools, new sectors opened in the fight for civil rights.

In 1955 and 1956, the Southern Christian Leadership (SCLC) Conference, headed by Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., boycotted segregated bus lines in Montgomery, Ala. They won.

The boycott, or "selective buying," as the Negro leaders prefer to say, began coming into play as a potent weapon in other parts of the South.

"Selective buying" has put Southern businessmen in a vise. If they integrate some facilities after a Negro boycott, they may be hit by a white boycott.

'Sit-In' Pioneer

Along with the boycott came the "sit-in," the tactic of simply sitting quietly in a restaurant, seeking service. Or the "kneel-in," crowds of Negroes praying on the steps of a public building or in a main street, stopping traffic.

These maneuvers were pioneered by the Committee on Racial Equality (CORE) which was founded in 1942 at the University of Chicago. It obtained a foothold in the South with the "sit-in" of 1960.

Parallel with action on these fronts, the Negroes began concentrating their efforts in another supremely important field — voter registration. Another Negro organization, the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee ("Snick") has been active in this work.

The Justice Department has assisted. Since 1961, it has filed 29 suits against officials for refusing to register qualified Negroes. About 50 per cent of these suits have been won.

The Southern Regional Council estimates there are 5,045,000 Negroes of voting age in 11 Southern and border states. About one fourth, some 1,344,000, are registered.

Many tactics have been used to discourage Negroes from registering — gerrymandering, intimidation, widely spaced meetings of registration boards, throwing out Negro applications on technicalities.

Registration Drives

So concerted voter-registration drives began. Students went through Negro communities, ringing doorbells. Officials stationed themselves in public buildings in the South, buttonholing every Negro who came in and urging him to register. Voter "clinics" went up to instruct Negroes in filling out the application forms, and in meeting the technicalities.

It is a long, slow process, but the figures for Negro registration are rising, spectacularly in some cases.

In all probability, another factor has played a part in the Negro drive for equality, a subtle unmeasurable factor—the new African nations.

The American Negro has seen African heads of state being received in the White House and getting the red carpet treatment from Soviet Premier Khrushchev and other powerful leaders. He has seen African diplomats speaking from the rostrum of the United Nations.

This has been a source of pride and encouragement.

Birmingham

Then came another catalyst — Birmingham.

Last spring, Negroes there demonstrated in the streets for desegregation of some facilities in downtown stores and the formation of a permanent biracial committee to handle racial problem .

For some reason, Birmingham appears to have dramatized the Negro struggle more than any other incident.

Almost overnight after Birmingham, Negro demonstrations erupted in the North where Negro demands focus mainly on jobs and housing.

Another recent development has been a unifying move among seven Negro organizations, some of which had been sniping at each other. They were the NAACP, CORE, SCLC, "Snick," the National Urban League, the National Council of Negro Women, and the Legal Defense and Education Fund of the NAACP, a separately incorporated organization.

The coalition takes the name, Council for United Civil Rights Leadership.

"Our primary concern is to eliminate violence," a spokesman said. "We want to provide a cadre of experienced Negro leaders who will prevent things from getting out of hand and keep irresponsible elements from turning to violence."

Distinctly separate from these groups are the "Black Muslims." They demand not integration, but total segregation on their own terms. They want the federal government to set aside territory in which they propose to set up a Negro state.

Their leader, Muhammad Elijah, lives in Phoenix, Ariz. In answer to the question of whether the "Muslims" hate white people, he said:

"The Bible teaches us to love good and to hate evil. I can't love him (the white) because his is the very essence of evil."

In the vast, complicated and potentially dangerous picture of the racial struggle today, what are the positive sides? The principal ones would seem to be these:

1. To a greater degree than ever before, the problem is out in the open. More people, especially in the North but in the South, too, are aware of the intricacies and the injustices. More are thinking about it, seeking solutions.

2. Some degree of communication between the races is being restored in the South. Communications, Southerners say, generally tended to break down after the Supreme Court decision on the schools in 1954. Now, fitfully and with difficulty, Negroes and whites in some parts of the South are sitting down together again.

Kennedy Conferences

3. President Kennedy, in conferences with scores of Southern businessmen, clergymen and others, has sought means to desegregate many establishments. He set up a presidential committee on equal job opportunity, replacing two other such committees of the Eisenhower administration. It is headed by Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson.

4. Congress is hearing testimony on the President's package of civil rights legislation. On June 11, he asked Congress to "make a commitment it has not fully made in this century to the proposition that race has no place in American life or law." Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy told the House Judiciary Committee, "This bill before you today embodies that commitment."

5. While the Negroes are crying for rights, a Negro lawyer, Mrs. Cora T. Walker, is making speeches sharply reminding them of their responsibilities. She tells them: "We are as much to blame for our present condition as the white majority."

On the political side, she says, "There are approximately one million black people in New York City. These Negroes have no restrictions on their voting rights. Yet there are only two elected Negroes in the entire city legislative government."

Of some social facts, she says, "We now are the major statistic in juvenile delinquency, dope addiction, crime and school dropouts. Is this why 75 per cent of the out-of-wedlock children are born of our race?"

Mrs. Walker suggests that Negroes should do more to help each other. "Isn't it our responsibility," she asks, "to take the initiative to secure the needs of our underprivileged?"

She says she has never had an adverse reaction from Negro audiences. "On the contrary, there have been more than 500 requests for reprints of these speeches."

Nearly 72 yers ago, on Aug. 19, 1891, the New York Mail & Express published a pathetic little item. It said some Negro clergymen had met to discuss means of obtaining "better opportunities" for their people.

Today, the Negro drive is for fully equal opportunity, for everything America offers every citizen.

The Mobile Press Register
MOBILE, ALA.
SUN. 89,891 PAGE ONE CERTIFIED
AUG 1 1 1963

Wallace Urging Voter 'Uprising'

Governor Seeking Support For Free Elector Movement

SHREVEPORT, La. (AP) — Alabama's Gov. George Wallace called on voters throughout the nation Saturday night to answer racial uprisings with a "demonstration of their own . . . at the polls in 1964."

"I've had enough of Kennedy," Wallace declared.

But he made no mention of what part he might play in the campaign—possibly by challenging President Kennedy in some of the presidential primaries, or as a "free elector" candidate, or both.

Wallace, in a speech prepared for a pro-segregation Citizens Council rally, renewed his oft-repeated criticism of Negro leaders for sponsoring protest demonstrations in and out of the South, and charged that the President had encouraged racial strife.

But, he continued, "There is a grass roots rebellion forming in this nation. I can sense it. In the last several weeks, over a quarter of a million letters have flooded into my office. . .

"People from all over this nation have written me that they stand with us in our fight against the ever-growing, all-powerful central government."

SOLONS LEARN

Some congressmen, too, are "finding out that meeting demands does not satisfy lawless agitators," Wallace declared. "It

(Page 6, Col. 6, WALLACE)

Legion

(Continued From Page One)

announced purpose of keeping the public schools open under all conditions. Mrs. Hollis J. Wiseman, wife of a local physician and president of the group, has stated that the governor was "misinformed" as to ABLE's aims and objectives and she asserted that the organization is not led by representatives of the Southern Regional Council "or any other organization."

In a written statement, Comdr. Crolich of the Legion post said the post executive committee "has examined certain material distributed by the Southern Regional Council, Inc., of Atlanta, Ga., for use by key workers of ABLE for the purpose of recruiting members."

"We found," Crolich continued, "this material to contain many things which we believe alien to the American way of life and the American way of doing things. We further examined testimony concerning the Southern Regional Council given under oath before a Mississippi state legislative committee and also testimony concerning this group given before an Arkansas legislative committee.

"There is no room for doubt that the origins, activities and affiliations of the Southern Regional Council are at best highly questionable."

MATERIAL AVAILABLE

Crolich stated that a number of copies of the material allegedly coming from the Southern Regional Council is being made available to Legion members and others.

"It is contemplated in the near future," he said, "that all of this evidence as well as any additional facts we may be able to obtain will be presented to a general (Legion) membership meeting, date of which will be announced shortly."

GREEN BAY, WIS
PRESS-GAZETTE
D 38 /54 S 38

AUG 11 1963

The Deepening Crisis: A Summation

Negroes' Drive for Complete E

Editor's note — Caught in the turmoil of a summer of bitter racial discord, Americans find it difficult at times to assess the dimensions of the crisis, to know what has been gained or lost and where we are heading now. Here, in the last of a special series of Associated Press articles on the integration struggle, is a report by a correspondent who has covered it closely. It sums up the situation to date and looks at changes coming.

By RELMAN MORIN

NEW YORK (AP) — The Negro drive for full equality has reached the dimensions of a national convulsion.

It wracks the whole United States, not just the southern states. It is breaching the invisible racial barriers of the north no less than the visible walls in the south, shattering the complacency of one region, defeating the slow-down strategy of the other.

"Something's got a-hold of me," the Negro is chanting, "We shall overcome," is his anthem.

His movement is in the streets, the courts, the halls of Congress.

It touches schools and employment practices, a seat at a lunch counter and a home in a better neighborhood, the right to vote and the right to worship in any church, the right to sit in any public park and to read a book in any public library—in short, the rights of an American citizen and access to equal opportunity.

Non-Violence Changed

Starting as non-violent, his campaign has engendered violence. The blood of both races has been spilled. No one can say whether more will flow, or where, or how much.

"We will advise our people not to use violence," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), at a news conference in Jackson, Miss. "The Negro can't win in a pitched battle with the whites. He's in the minority."

But can the Negro leaders control their followers, everywhere and at all times? Who, for example, speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

"How can anyone ask me to be non-violent?" said a Negro war veteran. "That's like putting me back in the line in Korea and loading my rifle with blanks."

Violence begets violence and the possibility of a white counter-reaction has been noted by many observers. "If that happens," said Hodding Carter, editor of the Greenville, Miss., Delta-Democrat, "All hell will break loose."

During the demonstrations in Birmingham last spring, a white taxi driver said to me, "If they kill any white people, I won't ask any questions. I'll just start killin'."

The hour seems late. Is it one minute to 12 now? If so, what raced the hands of the clock?

The story is soon told.

After World War II, the first important federal government action in race relations came when President Truman ordered the end of segregation in the armed forces. He also asked Congress for strong civil rights legislation. It was not granted.

During President Eisenhower's second administration, Congress enacted civil rights bills in 1957 and 1960. Using these laws, the administration filed 10 suits on behalf of Negroes' voting rights in the south.

The historic year, however, in the long and anguished struggle over civil rights, was 1954. The U.S. Supreme Court struck down, as unconstitutional, the doctrine of "separate-but-equal" in public schools. Segregation had been a legal fact for 58 years, based on a decision of the Supreme Court in 1896. Now, the court ordered the schools to be desegregated "with all deliberate speed."

Negro People Exulted

Negroes and their white sympathizers exulted.

But the segregationist, eyeing that phrase, "with all deliberate speed," saw an escape hatch. He determined to resist as long as possible. And he did.

Mob violence exploded in southern and border states.

A climactic point of this stage was Little Rock, Ark. The year was 1957. Exactly 80 years after the end of the reconstruction in the south, federal troops marched into a southern city again. They used bayonets to disperse crowds around Central High School. And they escorted Negro children into classrooms.

Elsewhere in the south, however, the barriers remained.

Oxford, Miss., and Tuscaloosa, Ala., were still to come.

At Oxford, two men died and scores were injured when a Negro, James H. Meredith, enrolled in the University of Mississippi. Again, federal troops marched, bivouacing on the campus.

At Tuscaloosa, Gov. George C. Wallace stood in the doorway of a University of Alabama building when Justice Department officials attempted to enroll two Negroes, Vivian Malone and James Hood. A few hours later, he stepped aside when federalized units of the National Guard marched onto the campus. There was no violence.

'New Day' Evaporates

Long before these incidents, however, the "bright-new-day" jubilance of 1954, had begun to evaporate.

Negro disappointment, as the years passed with little desegregation, turned to bitterness. "Gradualism," the policy of slowly ending segregation, and "tokenism," permitting only a handful of Negro children in schools, offices or factories, became fighting words.

Today, nearly 10 years after the Supreme Court decision, figures compiled by the Southern Education Reporting Service indicate that about 257,000 Negro children are attending public elementary and high schools with white students in 17 southern and border states and the District of Columbia.

Negro leaders say this is about eight per cent of the school-age total.

Apart from the schools, new sectors opened in the fight for civil rights.

In 1955 and 1956, the Southern Christian Leadership (SCLC) Conference, headed by the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., boycotted segregated bus lines in Montgomery, Ala. They won.

Buying Power Important

The boycott, or "selective buying," as the Negro leaders prefer to say, began coming into play as a potent weapon in other parts of the south. Negro economists estimate that the purchasing power of the Negro, nationally, is around $15 billion a year.

"Selective buying" has put southern businessmen in a vise. If they integrate some facilities after a Negro boycott, they may be hit by a white boycott.

Along with the boycott came the "sit-in," the tactic of simply sitting quietly in a restaurant, seeking service. Or the "kneel-in," crowds of Negroes praying on the steps of a public building or in a main street, stopping traffic.

These maneuvers were pioneered by the Committee on Racial Equality (CORE) which was founded in 1942 at the University of Chicago. It obtained a foothold in the south with the "sit-in" of 1960.

Parallel with action on these fronts, the Negroes began concentrating their efforts in another supremely important field—voter registration. Another Negro organization, the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee ("SNICK") has been active in this work.

Justice Dept. Assisted

The Justice Department has assisted. Since 1961, it has filed 29 suits against officials for refusing to register qualified Negroes. About 50 per cent of these suits have been won.

The Southern Regional Council estimates there are 5,045,000 Negroes of voting age in 11 southern and border states. About one fourth, some 1,344,000, are registered.

Many tactics have been used to discourage Negroes from registering —gerrymandering, intimidation, wide-

See Our Large Selection of Sleep...
Over 10 Styles To Choose From quality Convulses United States

Voting Instruction — A prospective voter is shown how to operate a voting machine by an instructor with a drawing of an average voting machine. This "clinic," one of a number set up in the South, is operated by members of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference in Atlanta, Ga. It is just one of a number of ways Negroes are trying to encourage members. (AP Photo) ly-spaced meeting of registration boards, throwing out Negro applications on technicalities.

So concerted voter-registration drives began. Students went through Negro communities, ringing doorbells. Officials stationed themselves in public buildings in the south, buttonholing every Negro who came in, whatever his business, and urging him to register, there and then. Voter "clinics" were set up to instruct Negroes in filling out the application forms, and in meeting the technicalities.

It is a long, slow process, but the figures for Negro registration are rising, spectacularly in some cases. In Bullock County, Ala., there were four registered Negroes in 1961. Now there are 1,341. This, of course, is a special case.

Of the registration drives, Bishop George W. Barber, of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, said:

Seeks Full Registration

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible Negro voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Ne-

"Freedom Riders" at a bus station. Nor, of course, was Birmingham the only city to use dogs.

Nevertheless, photographs of dogs leaping toward Negroes went around the globe.

For some reason, Birmingham appears to have dramatized the Negro struggle more than any other incident.

"Birmingham engineered the revolution that began in the spring of 1963," Martin Ochs, editor of the Chattanooga Times, said in a recent speech at the University of Wisconsin.

Conciliation Mood Set

Fear of violence and economic trouble has fostered a "mood of reconciliation" toward racial integration in the south, Ochs said.

Almost overnight after Birmingham, too, Negro demonstrations erupted in the north. Violence flared in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and other northern cities. The Los Angeles Times published a cartoon depicting two Negro figures, one in a menacing posture. It was captioned, "Integration not intimidation."

In the north, Negro demands focus mainly on jobs and housing. Negro unemployment is high, more than doulims" hate white people, he said:

"The Bible teaches us to love good and to hate evil. I can't love him (the white) because his is the very essence of evil."

In the vast, complicated and potentially dangerous picture of the racial struggle today, what are the positive sides? The principal ones would seem to be these:

● 1. To a greater degree than ever before, the problem is out in the open. More people, especially in the north but in the south, too, are aware of the intricacies and the injustices. More are thinking about it, seeking solutions.

● 2. Some degree of communication between the races is being restored in the south. Communications, southerners say, generally tended to break down after the Supreme Court decision on the schools in 1954. Now, fitfully and with difficulty, Negroes and whites in some parts of the south are sitting down together again. One southern newspaper publisher called such a meeting in his own plant—and deliberately placed the conference table where it could be seen through the window from the sidewalk.

● 3. President Kennedy, in conferences with scores of southern bu

Seeks Full Registration

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible Negro voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, north and south."

In all probability, another factor has played a part in the Negro drive for equality, a subtle, unmeasurable factor — the new African nations.

The American Negro has seen African heads of state being received in the White House and getting the red carpet treatment from Soviet Premier Khrushchev and other powerful leaders. He has seen African diplomats speaking from the rostrum of the United Nations.

This has been a source of pride and encouragement.

But it also is a two-edged sword. "An African in a robe and turban can go into a restaurant or a hotel where I can't go," said a Negro public relations man in Washington. "How silly can segregation be? How do you think this makes me feel?"

Then came another catalyst—Birmingham.

Arrests Filled Jails

Last spring, Negroes there demonstrated in the streets for desegregation of some facilities in downtown stores and the formation of a permanent biracial committee to handle racial problems. So many were arrested that the jails overflowed.

Police dogs and fire hoses were used to disperse the crowds. It was not the first time the dogs had been used in Birmingham. The first time was against white men, rioting around and other northern cities. The Los Angeles Times published a cartoon depicting two Negro figures, one in a menacing posture. It was captioned, "Integration not intimidation."

In the north, Negro demands focus mainly on jobs and housing. Negro unemployment is high, more than double white unemployment. Labor unions have been accused of discrimination against Negroes. Negro leaders are demanding that a certain quota of Negroes shall be employed on given projects, and even in restaurants.

Another recent development has been a unifying move among seven Negro organizations, some of which had been sniping at each other. They were the NAACP, CORE, SCLC, "SNICK," the National Urban League, the National Council of Negro Women, and the Legal Defense and Education Fund of the NAACP, a separately incorporated organization.

The coalition takes the name COUNCIG for United Civil Rights Leadership.

Nobody Wants Violence

"Our primary concern is to eliminate violence," a spokesman said. "We want to provide a cadre of experienced Negro leaders who will prevent things from getting out of hand and keep irresponsible elements from turning to violence."

Distinctly separate from these groups are the "Black Muslims." They demand, not integration, but total segregation on their own terms. They want the government to set aside territory in which they propose to set up a Negro state.

Their leader, Muhammad Elijah, lives in Phoenix, Ariz. In answer to the question of whether the "Mus-

What's in the Future — What lies in the future for this young Negro family walking along a Harlem street in New York? Will the Negro drive for full equality, now wracking the entire United States, be successful within their lifetime? Will the future hold a discrimination-free life of opportunity for their children? The blood of both races is being spilled as the originally non-violent campaign for equal opportunity engendered violence. Now both black and white are beginning to wonder where the campaign will lead. (AP Photo) are sitting down together again. One southern newspaper publisher called such a meeting in his own plant—and deliberately placed the conference table where it could be seen through the window from the sidewalk.

● 3. President Kennedy, in conferences with scores of southern businessmen, clergymen and others, has sought means to desegregate many establishments. He set up a Presidential Committee on Equal Job Opportunity, replacing two other such committees of the Eisenhower administration. It is headed by Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson.

● 4. Congress is hearing testimony on the President's package of civil rights legislation. On June 11, he asked Congress to "make a commitment it has not fully made in this century to the proposition that race has no place in American life or law." Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy told the House Judiciary Committee, "This bill before you today embodies that commitment."

● 5. While the Negroes are crying for rights, a Negro lawyer, Mrs. Cora T. Walker, is making speeches sharply reminding them of their responsibilities. She tells them:

"We are as much to blame for our present condition as the white majority."

Little Political Gain

On the political side, she says, "There are approximately one million black people in New York City. These Negroes have no restrictions on their voting rights. Yet there are only two elected Negroes in the entire city legislative government."

Of the economic situation, Mrs. Walker says, "In Harlem alone, Negroes spend $150 million on automobiles, $80 million on liquor, $75 million on wigs and hair pieces, $100 million on playing the numbers. More than 90 per cent of the businesses in our ghettos are owned, controlled and managed by whites outside the community. We give minimum support to our own, who are in business or professions."

Of some social facts, she says, "We now are the major statistic in juvenile delinquency, dope addiction, crime, and school drop-outs. Is this why 75 per cent of the out-of-wedlock children are born of our race?"

Mrs. Walker suggests that Negroes should do more to help each other. "Isn't it our responsibility," she asks, "to take the initiative to secure the needs of our underprivileged?"

She says she has never had an adverse reaction from Negro audiences. "On the contrary, there have been more than 500 requests for reprints of these speeches."

A similar position was taken recently by another minority group, the "Nisei," or American-born Japanese. In San Francisco, Howard Imazeki, editor of the newspaper, Hobukei Mainichi, said in an editorial:

"We have yet to hear any Negro voices blaming themselves for their social maladjustment.

Soul-Searching Needed

"What we are trying to say most sincerely here is that the Negro leaders should do a little soul-searching of their own."

Nearly 72 years ago, on Aug. 19, 1891, the New York Mail & Express published a pathetic little item. It said some Negro clergymen had met to discuss means of obtaining "better opportunities" for their people.

Today, the Negro drive is for fully equal opportunity, for everything America offers every citizen.

MADISON, WIS.
WISCONSIN STATE
JOURNAL
D. 57,214 S. 88,403

AUG 11 1963

The Drive for Equality: Is it 1 Minute to 12?

By RELMAN MORIN
(Of The Associated Press)

NEW YORK—The Negro drive for full equality has reached the dimensions of a national convulsion.

It wracks the whole United States, not just the southern states. It is breaching the invisible racial barriers of the North no less than the visible walls in the South, shattering the complacency of one region, defeating the slow-down strategy of the other.

"Something's got a-hold of me," the Negro is chanting. "We Shall Overcome," is his anthem.

His movement is in the streets, the courts, the halls of Congress.

It touches schools and employment practices, a seat at a lunch counter and a home in a better neighborhood, the right to vote and the right to worship in any church, the right to sit in any public park and to read a book in any public library—in short, the rights of an American citizen and access to equal opportunity.

Starting as non-violent, his campaign has engendered violence. The blood of both races has been spilled. No one can say whether more will flow, or where, or how much.

"We will advise our people not to use violence," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), at a news conference in Jackson, Miss. "The Negro can't win in a pitched battle with the whites. He's in the minority."

But can the Negro leaders control their followers, everywhere and at all times? Who, for example, speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

"How can anyone ask me to be non-violent?" said a Negro war veteran. "That's like putting me back in the line in Korea and loading my rifle with blanks."

Violence begets violence and the possibility of a white counter-reaction has been noted by many observers. "If that happens," said Hodding Carter, editor of the Greenville, Miss., Delta-Democrat, "all hell will break loose."

During the demonstrations in Birmingham last spring, a white taxi driver said to me, "If they kill any white people, I won't ask any questions. I'll just start killin'."

The hour seems late. Is it 1 minute to 12 now? If so, what raced the hands of the clock?

The story is soon told.

* * *

After World War II, the first important federal government action in race relations came when President Truman ordered the end of segregation in the armed forces. He also asked Congress for strong civil rights legislation. It was not granted.

During President Eisenhower's second administration, Congress enacted civil rights bills in 1957 and 1960. Using these laws, the Administration filed 10 suits on behalf of Negroes' voting rights in the South.

The Historic Year: 1954

The historic year, however, in the long and anguished struggle over civil rights, was 1954. The U. S. Supreme Court struck down, as unconstitutional, the doctrine of "separate-but-equal" in public schools. Segregation had been a legal fact for 58 years, based on a decision of the Supreme Court in 1896. Now, the court ordered the schools to be desegregated "with What lies in the future for this young Negro family walking along a Harlem street in New York? Will the Negro drive for full equality, now wracking the entire United States, be successful within their lifetime? Will the future hold a life of real opportunity, free of discrimination for their child?

—AP Newsfeatures Photo

toward racial integration in the South, Ochs said.

* * *

Almost overnight after Birmingham, too, Negro demonstrations erupted in the North. Violence flared in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, and other northern cities. The Los Angeles Times published a cartoon depicting two Negro figures, one in a menacing posture. It was captioned, "integration not intimidation."

In the North, Negro demands focus mainly on jobs and housing.

Negro unemployment is high, more than double white unemployment. Labor unions have been accused of discriminating against Negroes. Negro leaders are demanding that a certain quota of Negroes shall be employed on given projects, and even in restaurants.

In New York City, to dramatize these and other demands, Negroes entered the offices of Gov. Nelson Rockefeller for a "sit-in." They staged another in the city hall.

Another recent development has been a unifying move among seven Negro organizations, some of which had been sniping at each other. They were the NAACP, CORE, SCLC, "Snick," the National Urban League, the National Council of Negro Women, and the Legal Defense and Education Fund of the NAACP, a separately incorporated organization.

The coalition takes the name Council for United Civil Rights Leadership.

"Our primary concern is to eliminate violence," a spokesman said. "We want to provide a cadre of experienced Negro leaders who will prevent things from getting out of hand and keep irresponsible elements from turning to violence."

* * *

Distinctly separate from these groups are the "Black Muslims." They demand, not integration, but total segregation on their own terms. They want the federal government to set aside territory in which they propose to set up a Negro state.

Their leader, Muhammad Elijah, lives in Phoenix, Ariz. In answer to the question of whether the "Muslims" hate white people, he said:

"The Bible teaches us to love good and to hate evil. I can't love him (the white) because his is the very essence of evil."

* * *

In the vast, complicated, and potentially dangerous picture of the racial struggle today, what are the positive sides? The principal ones would seem to be these:

ONE. To a greater degree than ever before, the problem is out in the open. More generally tended to break down after the Supreme Court decision on the schools in 1954. Now, fitfully and with difficulty, Negroes and whites in some parts of the South are sitting down together again.

One southern newspaper publisher called such a meeting in his own plant—and deliberately placed the conference table where it could be seen through the window from the sidewalk.

THREE. President Kennedy, in conferences with scores of southern businessmen, clergymen, and others, has sought means to desegregate many etablishments. He set up a presidential committee on equal job opportunity, replacing two other such committees of the Eisenhower administration. It is headed by Vice-President Lyndon B. Johnson.

FOUR. Congress is hearing testimony on the President's package of civil rights legislation. On June 11, he asked Congress to "Make a commitment it has not fully made in this century to the proposition that race has no place in American life or law." Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy told the House Judiciary committee, "This bill before you today embodies that commitment."

FIVE. While the Negroes are crying for rights, a Negro lawyer, Mrs. Cora T. Walker, is making speeches sharply reminding them of their responsibilities. She tells them:

"We are as much to blame for our present condition as the white majority."

* * *

On the political side, she says, "There are approximately one million black people in New York City. These Negroes have no restrictions on their voting rights. Yet there are only two elected Negroes in the entire city legislative government."

Of the economic situation, Mrs. Walker says, "In Harlem alone, Negroes spend $150 million a year on automobiles, $80 million on liquor, $75 million on wigs and hair pieces, $100 million on playing the numbers. More than 90 per cent of the businesses in our ghettos are owned, controlled, and managed by whites outside of the community. We give minimum support to our own, who are in businesses or professions."

Of some social facts, she says, "We now are the major statistic in juvenile delinquency, dope addiction, crime, and school drop-outs. Is this why 75 per cent of the out-of-wedlock children are born of our race?"

Mrs. Walker suggests that Negroes should do more to help each other. "Isn't it our responsibility," she asks, "to take the initiative to secure the needs of our underprivileged?"

She says she has never had an adverse

Wisconsin State Journal
Page About People

said a Negro public relations man in Washington. "How silly can segregation be? How do you think this makes me feel?"

* * *

Then came another catalyst — Birmingham.

Wisconsin State Journal

Page About People

SUNDAY, AUGUST 11, 1963 SECTION 3, PAGE 5

During President Eisenhower's second administration, Congress enacted civil rights bills in 1957 and 1960. Using these laws, the Administration filed 10 suits on behalf of Negroes' voting rights in the South.

The Historic Year: 1954

The historic year, however, in the long and anguished struggle over civil rights, was 1954. The U. S. Supreme Court struck down, as unconstitutional, the doctrine of "separate-but-equal" in public schools. Segregation had been a legal fact for 58 years, based on a decision of the Supreme Court in 1896. Now, the court ordered the schools to be desegregated "with all deliberate speed."

Negroes and their white sympathizers exulted.

But the segregationist, eying that phrase, "with all deliberate speed," saw an escape hatch. He determined to resist as long as possible. And he did.

Mob violence exploded in southern and border states.

A climactic point of this stage was Little Rock, Ark. The year was 1957. Exactly 80 years after the end of the Reconstruction in the South, federal troops marched into a southern city again. They used bayonets to disperse crowds around Central High school. And they escorted Negro children into classrooms.

* * *

Elsewhere in the South, however, the barriers remained.

Oxford, Miss., and Tuscaloosa, Ala., were still to come.

At Oxford, two men died and scores were injured when a Negro, James H. Meredith, enrolled in the University of Mississippi. Again, federal troops marched, bivouacing on the campus.

At Tuscaloosa, Gov. George C. Wallace stood in the doorway of a University of Alabama building when Justice Department officials attempted to enroll two Negroes, Vivian Malone and James Hood. A few hours later, he stepped aside when federalized units of the National Guard marched onto the campus. There was no violence.

* * *

Lone before these incidents, however, the "bright-new-day" jubilance of 1954 had begun to evaporate.

Negro disappointment, as the years passed with little desegregation, turned to bitterness. "Gradualism," the policy of slowly ending segregation, and "tokenism," permitting only a handful of Negro children in schools, offices, or factories, became fighting words.

Today, nearly 10 years after the Supreme Court decision, figures compiled by the Southern Education Reporting Service indicate that about 257,000 Negro children are attending public elementary and high schools with white students in 17 southern and border states and the District of Columbia.

Negro leaders say this is about 8 per cent of the school-age total.

* * *

Apart from the schools, new sectors opened in the fight for civil rights.

In 1955 and 1956, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, (SCLC) headed by the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., boycotted segregated bus lines in Montgomery, Ala. They won.

The boycott, or "slective buying," as the Negro leaders prefer to say, began coming into play as a potent weapon in other parts of the South. Negro economists estimate that the purchasing power of the Negro, nationally, is around $15 billion a year.

"Selective buying" has put southern businessmen in a vise. If they integrate some facilities after a Negro boycott, they may be hit by a white boycott.

Along with the boycott came the "sit-in," the tactic of simply sitting quietly in a restaurant, seeking service. Or the "kneel-in," crowds of Negroes praying on the steps of a public building or in a main street, stopping traffic.

These maneuvers were pioneered by the Congress on Racial Equality (CORE) which was founded in 1942 at the University of Chicago. It obtained a foothold in the South with the "sit-in" of 1960.

* * *

Parallel with action on these fronts, the Negroes began concentrating their efforts in another supremely important field — voter registration. Another Negro organization, the Student Non-Violence Coordinating Committee ("Snick") has been active in this work.

The Justice Department has assisted. Since 1961, it has filed 29 suits against officials for refusing to register qualified Negroes. About 50 per cent of these suits have been won.

The Southern Regional Council estimates there are 5,045,000 Negroes of voting age in 11 southern and border states. About one fourth, some 1,344,000, are registered.

Many tactics have been used to discourage Negroes from registering—gerrymandering, intimidation, widely-spaced meetings of registration boards, throwing out Negro applications on technicalities.

So concerted voter-registration drives began. Students went through Negro communities, ringing doorbells. Officials stationed themselves in public buildings in the South, buttonholing every Negro who came in, whatever his business, and urging him to register, there and then. Voter "clinics" were set up to instruct Negroes in filling out the application forms, and in meeting the technicalities.

It is a long, slow process, but the figures for Negro registration are rising, spectacularly in some cases. In Bullock county, Ala., there were four registered Negroes in 1961. Now there are 1,341. This, of course, is a special case.

Of the registration drives, Bishop George W. Barber, of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible Negro voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, north and south."

* * *

In all probability, another factor has played a part in the Negro drive for equality, a subtle, unmeasurable factor—the new African nations.

The American Negro has seen African heads of state being received in the White House and getting the red carpet treatment from Soviet Premier Khrushchev and other powerful leaders. He has seen African diplomats speaking from the rostrum of the United Nations.

This has been a source of pride and encouragement.

But it also is a two-edged sword. "An African in a robe and turban can go into a restaurant or a hotel where I can't go," said a Negro public relations man in Washington. "How silly can segregation be? How do you think this makes me feel?"

* * *

Then came another catalyst — Birmingham.

Last spring, Negroes there demontrated in the streets for desegregation of some facilities in downtown stores and the formation of a permanent biracial committee to handle racial problems. So many were arrested that the jails overflowed.

Police dogs and fire hoses were used to disperse the crowds. It was not the first time the dogs had been used in Birmingham. The first time was against white men, rioting around "freedom riders" at a bus station. Nor, of course, was Birmingham the only city to use dogs.

Nevertheless, photographs of dogs leaping toward Negroes went around the globe.

For some reason, Birmingham appears to have dramatized the Negro struggle more than any other incident.

"Birmingham engineered the revolution that began in the spring of 1963," Martin Ochs, editor of the Chattanooga Times, said in a recent speech at the University of Wisconsin.

Fear of violence and economic trouble has fostered a "mood of reconciliation"

What lies in the future for this young Negro family walking along a Harlem street in New York? Will the Negro drive for full equality, now wracking the entire United States, be successful within their lifetime? Will the future hold a life of real opportunity, free of discrimination for their child?

—AP Newsfeatures Photo

of whether the "Muslims" hate white people, he said:

"The Bible teaches us to love good and to hate evil. I can't love him (the white) because his is the very essence of evil."

* * *

In the vast, complicated, and potentially dangerous picture of the racial struggle today, what are the positive sides? The principal ones would seem to be these:

ONE. To a greater degree than ever before, the problem is out in the open. More people, especially in the North but in the South, too, are aware of the intricacies and the injustices. More are thinking about it, seeking solutions.

TWO. Some degree of communication between the races is being restored in the South. Communications, southerners say, fessions."

Of some social facts, she says, "We now are the major statistic in juvenile delinquency, dope addiction, crime, and school drop-outs. Is this why 75 per cent of the out-of-wedlock children are born of our race?"

Mrs. Walker suggests that Negroes should do more to help each other. "Isn't it our responsibility," she asks, "to take the initiative to secure the needs of our underprivileged?"

She says she has never had an adverse reaction from Negro audiences. "On the contrary, there have been more than 500 requests for reprints of these speeches."

A similar position was taken recently by another minority group, the "Nisei," or American-born Japanese. In San Francisco, Howard Imazeki, editor of the newspaper Hobukei Mainichi, said in an editorial:

"We have yet to hear any Negro voices blaming themselves for their social maladjustment.

"What we are trying to say most sincerely here is that the Negro leaders should do a little soul-searching of their own."

* * *

Nearly 72 years ago, on Aug. 19, 1891, the New York Mail and Express published a pathetic little item. It said some Negro clergymen had met to discuss means of obtaining "better opportunities" for their people.

Today, the Negro drive is for fully equal opportunity, for everything America offers every citizen.

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
D. 55,233 S. 93,957

AUG 11 1963

Deepening Crisis

One Minute to

A Broad Assessment by Expert

Caught in turmoil of a summer of bitter racial discord, Americans find it difficult at times to assess the dimensions of the crisis, to know what has been gained or lost and where we are heading now. Here, in the last of a series of Associated Press articles on the integration struggle, is a report by a correspondent who has covered it closely. It sums up the situation to date and looks at changes coming.

Background of THE TIMES

Sunday, August 11, 1963. A—7

By RELMAN MORIN

NEW YORK (AP)—The Negro drive for full equality has reached the dimensions of a national convulsion.

It wracks the whole United States, not just the Southern states. It is breaching the invisible racial barriers of the North no less than the visible walls in the South, shattering the complacency of one region, defeating the slow-down strategy of the other.

"Something's got a-hold of me," the Negro is chanting. "We shall overcome," is his anthem.

His movement is in the streets, the courts, the halls of Congress.

It touches schools and employment practices, a seat at a lunch counter and a home in a better neighborhood, the right to vote and the right to worship in any church, the right to sit in any public park and to read a book in any public library—in short, the rights of an American citizen and access to equal opportunity.

Starting as nonviolent, his campaign has engendered violence. The blood of both races has been spilled. No one can say whether more will flow, or where, or how much.

"We will advise our people not to use violence," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, at a news conference in Jackson, Miss. "The Negro can't win in a pitched battle with the whites. He's in the minority."

But can the Negro leaders control their followers, everywhere and at all times? Who, for example, speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

"How can anyone ask me to be nonviolent?" said a Negro war veteran. "That's like putting me back in the line in Korea and loading my rifle with blanks."

Violence begets violence and the possibility of a white counter-reaction has been noted by many observers. "If that happens," said Hodding Carter, editor of the Greenville, Miss., Delta-Democrat, "all hell will break loose."

During the demonstrations in Birmingham last spring, a white taxi driver said to me, "If they kill any white people, I won't ask any questions. I'll just start killin'."

The hour seems late. Is it one minute to 12 now? If so, what raced the hands of the clock?

The story is soon told.

After World War II, the first important federal government action in race relations came when President Truman ordered the end of segregation in the armed forces. He also asked Congress for strong civil rights legislation. It was not granted.

During President Eisenhower's second administration, Congress enacted civil rights bills in 1957 and 1960. Using these laws, the administration filed 10 suits on behalf of Negroes' voting rights in the South.

The historic year, however, in the long and anguished struggle over civil rights, was 1954. The U.S. Supreme Court struck down, as unconstitutional, the doctrine of "separate-but-equal" in public schools. Segregation had been a legal fact for 58 years, based on a decision of the Supreme Court in 1896. Now, the court ordered the schools to be de "with all deliberate sp

Negroes and their pathizers exulted.

But the segregation that phrase, "with all speed," saw an escape determined to resist possible. And he did.

Mob violence exp Southern and border

A climactic point of was Little Rock, Ark. was 1957. Exactly 80 the end of the recons the South, federal troop into a Southern city a used bayonets to dispe around Central High S they escorted Negro ch classrooms.

Elsewhere in the S ever, the barriers rema

Oxford, Miss., and Ala., were still to come

At Oxford, two men scores were injured w gro, James H. Meredit in the University of Again, federal troops bivouacing on the ca

At Tuscaloosa, Gov. Wallace stood in the a University of Alaban when Justice Departme attempted to enroll tw Vivian Maline and Ja A few hours later, h aside when federalize the National Guard ma the campus. There w lence.

Long before these however, the "brigh jubilance of 1954 had evaporate.

Negro disappointmen years passed with littl gation, turned to "Gradualism," the polic

In 1957 . . . Integration at Little Rock

In 1963 . . . Voting Instruction in Atla

Crisis

e to 12?

the schools to be desegregated "with all deliberate speed."

Negroes and their white sympathizers exulted.

But the segregationist, eyeing that phrase, "with all deliberate speed," saw an escape hatch. He determined to resist as long as possible. And he did.

Mob violence exploded in Southern and border states.

A climactic point of this stage was Little Rock, Ark. The year was 1957. Exactly 80 years after the end of the reconstruction in the South, federal troops marched into a Southern city again. They used bayonets to disperse crowds around Central High Schoo And they escorted Negro children into classrooms.

Elsewhere in the South, however, the barriers remained.

Oxford, Miss., and Tuscaloosa, Ala., were still to come.

At Oxford, two men died and scores were injured when a Negro, James H. Meredith, enrolled in the University of Mississippi. Again, federal troops marched, bivouacing on the campus.

At Tuscaloosa, Gov. George C. Wallace stood in the doorway of a University of Alabama building when Justice Department officials attempted to enroll two Negroes, Vivian Maline and James Hood. A few hours later, he stepped aside when federalized units of the National Guard marched onto the campus. There was no violence.

Long before these incidents, however, the "bright-new-day" jubilance of 1954 had begun to evaporate.

Negro disappointment, as the years passed with little desegregation, turned to bitterness. "Gradualism," the policy of slowly ending segregation, and "tokenism," permitting only a handful of Negro children in schools, offices or factories, became fighting words.

Today, nearly 10 years after the Supreme Court decision, figures compiled by the Southern Education Reporting Service indicate that about 257,000 Negro children are attending public elementary and high schools with white students in 17 Southern and border states and the District of Columbia.

Negro leaders say this is about 8 per cent of the school-age total.

Apart from the schools, new sectors opened in the fight for civil rights.

In 1955 and 1956, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, headed by the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., boycotted segregated bus lines in Montgomery, Ala. They won.

The boycott, or "selective buying," as the Negro leaders prefer to say, began coming into play as a potent weapon in other parts of the South. Negro economists estimate that the purchasing power of the Negro, nationally, is around $15 billion a year.

"Selective buying" has put Southern businessmen in a vise. If they integrate some facilities after a Negro boycott, they may be hit by a white boycott.

Along with the boycott came the "sit-in," the tactic of simply sitting quietly in a restaurant, seeking service. Or the "kneel-in," crowds of Negroes praying on the steps of a public building or in a main street, stopping traffic.

These maneuvers were pioneered by the Congress of Racial Equality, which was founded in 1942 at the University of Chicago. It obtained a foothold in the South with the sit-ins of 1960.

Parallel with action on these fronts the Negroes began concentrating their efforts in another supremely important field — voter registration. Another Negro organization, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee — "SNICK"—has been active in this work.

The Justice Department has assisted. Since 1961, it has filed 29 suits against officials for refusing to register qualified Negroes. About 50 per cent of these suits have been won.

The Southern Regional Council estimates there are 5,045,000 Negroes of voting age in 11 Southern and border states. About one-fourth, some 1,344,000, are registered.

Many tactics have been used to discourage Negroes from registering — gerrymandering, intimida-struction in Atlanta

What's in Future for Family Walking Along Harlem Street?

recent speech at the Uiversity of Wisconsin.

Fear of violence and economic trouble has fostered a "mood of reconciliation" toward racial integration in the south, Ochs said.

Almost overnight after Birmingham, too, Negro demonstrations erupted in the North. Violence flared in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and other Northern cities. The Los Angeles Times published a cartoon depicting two Negro figures, one in a menacing posture. It was captioned, "Integration, not intimidation."

In the North, Negro demands focus mainly on jobs and housing. Negro unemployment is high, more than double white unemployment. Labor unions have been accused of discriminating against Negroes. Negro leaders are demanding that a certain quota of Negroes shall be employed on given projects, and even in restaurants.

In New York City, to dramatize these and other demands, Negroes entered the offices of Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller and stayed for days in a sit-in. They staged another in the City Hall.

Another recent development has been a unifying move among sev-

On the political side, she says, "There are approximately one million black people in New York City. These Negroes have no restrictions on their voting rights. Yet there are only two elected Negroes in the entire city legislative government."

Of the economic situation, Mrs. Walker says, "In Harlem alone, Negroes spend $150 million a year on automobiles, $80 million on liquor, $75 million on wigs and hair pieces, $100 million on playing the numbers. More than 90 per cent of the businesses in our ghettos are owned, controlled and managed by whites outside of the community. We give minimum support to our own, who are in businesses or professions."

Of some social facts, she says, "We now are the major statistic in juvenile delinquency, dope addiction, crime, and school dropouts. Is this why 75 per cent of the out-of-wedlock children are born of our race?"

Mrs. Walker suggests that Negroes should do more to help each other. "Isn't it our responsibility," she asks, "to take the initiative to secure the needs of our underprivileged?"

She says she has never had an adverse reaction from Negro audiences. "On the contrary, there have been more than 500 requests for reprints of these speeches."

A similar position was taken recently by another minority group, the Nisei, or American-born Japanese. In San Francisco, Howard Imazeki, editor of the newspaper, Hobukei Mainichi, said in an editorial:

"We have yet to hear any Negro voices blaming themselves for their social maladjustment.

"What we are trying to say most sincerely here is that the Negro leaders should do a little soul-searching of their own."

Nearly 72 years ago, on Aug. 19, 1891, the New York Mail & Express published a pathetic little item. It said some Negro clergymen had met to discuss means of obtaining "better opportunities" for their people.

Today, the Negro drive is for fully equal opportunity, for everything America offers every citizen.

"SNICK"—has been active in this work.

The Justice Department has assisted. Since 1961, it has filed 29 suits against officials for refusing to register qualified Negroes. About 50 per cent of these suits have been won.

The Southern Regional Council estimates there are 3,045,000 Negroes of voting age in 11 Southern and border states. About one-fourth, some 1,344,000, are registered.

Many tactics have been used to discourage Negroes from registering — gerrymandering, intimidation, widely-spaced meetings of registration boards, throwing out Negro applications on technicalities.

So concerted voter-registration drives began. Students went through Negro communities, ringing doorbells. Officials stationed themselves in public buildings in the South, buttonholing every Negro who came in, whatever his business, and urging him to register, there and then. Voter "clinics" were set up to instruct Negroes in filling out the application forms, and in meeting the technicalities.

It is a long, slow process, but the figures for Negro registration are rising, spectacularly in some cases. In Bullock County, Alabama, there were four registered Negroes in 1961. Now there are 1,341. This, of course, is a special case.

Of the registration drives, Bishop George W. Barber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible Negro voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

In all probability, another factor has played a part in the Negro drive for equality, a subtle, unmeasureable factor—the new African nations.

The American Negro has seen African heads of state being received in the White House and getting the red carpet treatment from Soviet Premier Khrushchev and other powerful leaders. He has seen African diplomats speaking from the rostrum of the United Nations.

This has been a source of pride and encouragement.

But it also is a two-edged sword. "An African in a robe and turban can go into a restaurant or a hotel where I can't go," said a Negro public relations man in Washington. "How silly can segregation be? How do you think this makes me feel?"

Then came another catalyst—Birmingham.

Last spring, Negroes there demonstrated in the streets for desegregation of some facilities in downtown stores and the formation of a permanent biracial committee to handle racial problems. So many were arrested that the jails overflowed.

Police dogs and fire hoses were used to disperse the crowds. It was not the first time the dogs had been used in Birmingham. The first time was against white men, rioting around "freedom riders" at a bus station. Nor, of course, was Birmingham the only city to use dogs.

Nevertheless, photographs of dogs leaping toward Negroes went around the globe.

For some reason, Birmingham appears to have dramatized the Negro struggle more than any other incident.

"Birmingham engineered the revolution that began in the spring of 1963," Martin Ochs, editor of the Chattanooga Times, said in a Negro unemployment is high, more than double white unemployment. Labor unions have been accused of discriminating against Negroes. Negro leaders are demanding that a certain quota of Negroes shall be employed on given projects, and even in restaurants.

In New York City, to dramatize these and other demands, Negroes entered the offices of Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller and stayed for days in a sit-in. They staged another in the City Hall.

Another recent development has been a unifying move among seven Negro organizations, some of which had been sniping at each other. They were the NAACP, CORE, SCLC, "SNICK," the National Urban League, the National Council of Negro Women, and the Legal Defense and Education Fund of the NAACP, a separately incorporated organization.

The coalition takes the name Council for United Civil Rights Leadership.

"Our primary concern is to eliminate violence," a spokesman said. "We want to provide a cadre of experienced Negro leaders who will prevent things from getting out of hand and keep irresponsible elements from turning to violence."

Distinctly separate from these groups are the Black Muslims. They demand, not integration, but total segregation on their own terms. They want the federal government to set aside territory in which they propose to set up a Negro state.

Their leader, Muhammad Elijah, lives in Phoenix, Ariz. In answer to the question of whether the Muslims hate white people, he said:

"The Bible teaches us to love good and to hate evil. I can't love him (the white) because his is the very essence of evil."

In the vast, complicated and potentially dangerous picture of the racial struggle today, what are the positive sides? The principal ones would seem to be these:

1. To a greater degree than ever before, the problem is out in the open. More people, especially in the North but in the South, too, are aware of the intricacies and the injustices. More are thinking about it, seeking solutions.

2. Some degree of communication between the races is being restored in the South. Communications, Southerners say, generally tended to break down after the Supreme Court decision on the schools in 1954. Now, fitfully and with difficulty, Negroes and whites in some parts of the South are sitting down together again. One Southern newspaper publisher called such a meeting in his own plant—and deliberately placed the conference table where it could be seen through the window from the sidewalk.

3. President Kennedy, in conferences with scores of Southern businessmen, clergymen and others, has sought means to desegregate many establishments. He set up a presidential committee on equal job opportunity, replacing two other such committees of the Eisenhower administration. It is headed by Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson.

4. Congress is hearing testimony on the President's package of civil rights legislation. On June 11, he asked Congress to "make a commitment it has not fully made in this century to the proposition that race has no place in American life or law." Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy told the House Judiciary Committee, "This bill before you today embodies that commitment."

5. While the Negroes are crying for rights, a Negro lawyer, Cora T. Walker, is making speeches sharply reminding them of their responsibilities.

She tells them: "We are as much to blame for our present condition as the white majority."

community. We give minimum support to our own, who are in businesses or professions."

Of some social facts, she says, "We now are the major statistic in juvenile delinquency, dope addiction, crime, and school dropouts. Is this why 75 per cent of the out-of-wedlock children are born of our race?"

Mrs. Walker suggests that Negroes should do more to help each other. "Isn't it our responsibility," she asks, "to take the

"What we are trying to say most sincerely here is that the Negro leaders should do a little soul-searching of their own."

Nearly 72 years ago, on Aug. 19, 1891, the New York Mail & Express published a pathetic little item. It said some Negro clergymen had met to discuss means of obtaining "better opportunities" for their people.

Today, the Negro drive is for fully equal opportunity, for everything America offers every citizen.

SHEAFFER'S

THE DAILY OKLAHOMAN
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
D. 173,499 S. 272,503

AUG 1 1 1963

Negroes' Drive for Equality Heig

By Relman Morin

NEW YORK (AP)—The Negro drive for full equality has reached the dimensions of a national convulsion.

It wracks the whole United States, not just the southern states. It is breaching the invisible racial barriers of the north no less than the visible walls in the south, shattering the complacency of one region, defeating the slowdown strategy of the other.

"Something's got a-hold of me," the Negro is chanting. "We shall overcome," is his anthem.

His movement is in the streets, the courts, the halls of congress.

It touches schools and employment practices, a seat at a lunch counter and a home in a better neighborhood, the right to vote and the right to worship in any church, the right to sit in any public park and to read a book in any public library — in short, the rights of an American citizen and access to equal opportunity.

Last of a Series

Starting as non-violent, his campaign has engendered violence. The blood of both races has been spilled. No one can say whether more will flow, or where, or how much.

"We will advise our people not to use violence," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), at a news conference in Jackson, Miss. "The Negro can't win in a pitched battle with the whites. He's in the minority."

But can the Negro leaders control their followers, everywhere and at all times? Who, for example, speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

"How can anyone ask me to be non-violent?" said a Negro war veteran. "That's like putting me back in the line in Korea year was 1957. Exactly 80 years after the end of the reconstruction in the south, federal troops marched into a southern city again. They used bayonets to disperse crowds around Central High School. And they escorted School. And they escorted Negro children into classrooms.

Elsewhere in the south, however, the barriers remained.

Oxford, Miss., and Tuscaloosa, Ala., were still to come.

At Oxford, two men died and scores were injured when a Negro, James Meredith, enrolled in the University of Mississippi. Again, federal troops marched, bivouacing on the campus.

At Tuscaloosa, Gov. George Wallace stood in the doorway of a University of Alabama building when justice department officials attempted to enroll two Negroes, Vivian Malone and James Hood. A few hours later, he stepped aside when federalized units of the national guard marched onto the campus. There was no violence.

Long before these incidents, however, the "bright - new - day" jubilance of 1954 had begun to evaporate.

Negro disappointment, as the years passed with little desegregation, turned to bitterness. "Gradualism," the policy of slowly ending segregation, and "tokenism," permitting only a handful of Negro children in schools, offices or factories, became fighting words.

Today, nearly 10 years after the supreme court decision, figures compiled by the Southern Education Reporting Service indicate that about 257,000 Negro children are attending public elementary and high schools with white students in 17 southern and border states and the District of Columbia.

Birmingham, Ala., firemen turn hos fourth, some 1,344,000, are registered.

Many tactics have been used to discourage Negroes from registering—gerrymandering, intimidation, widely-spaced meetings of registration boards, throwing out Negro applications on technicalities.

So concerted voter-registration drives began. Students went through Negro communities, ringing doorbells. Officials stationed themselves in public buildings in the south, buttonholing every Negro who came in, whatever his business, and urging him to register, there and then. Voter "clinics" were set up to instruct Negroes in filling out the application forms, and in meeting the technicalities.

It is a long, slow process, but the rigures for Negro registration are rising, spectacularly in some cases. In Bullock County, Ala., there were four registered Negroes in 1961. Now there are 1,451. This.

ward Negroes went around the globe.

For some reason, Birmingham appears to have dramatized the Negro struggle more than any other incident.

Almost overnight after Birmingham, too, Negro demonstrations erupted in the north. Violence flared in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and other northern cities. The Los Angeles Times published a cartoon depicting two Negro figures, one in a menacing posture. It was captioned, "Integration Not Intimidation."

In the north, Negro demands focus mainly on jobs and housing. Negro unemployment is high, more than double white unemployment. Labor unions have been accused of discriminating against Negroes. Negro leaders are demanding that a certain quota of Negroes shall be employed on given projects, and even in restau-

Heightens in Intensity, Engulfs U. S.

emen turn hoses on Negroes to break up demonstration earlier this ear.

vent around eason, Bir-rs to have he Negro than any night after too, Negro erupted in ence flared

, Philadeland other
. The Los published icting two one in a re. It was
"Integradation."

Negro de-mainly on
ing. Negro is high, uble white Labor un-accused of against Ne-eaders are t a certain es shall be given proj-
in restau-

TWO.—Some degree, of communication between the races is being restored in the south. Communications, southerners say, generally tended to break down after the supreme court decision on the schools in 1954. Now, fitfully and with difficulty, Negroes and whites in some parts of the south are sitting down together again. One southern newspaper publisher called such a meeting in his own plant — and deliberately placed the conference table where it could be seen through the window from the sidewalk.

THREE. — President Kennedy, in conferences with scores of southern businessmen, clergymen and others, has sought means to desegregate many establishments. He set up a presidential committee on equal job opportunity, replacing two more to help eaach other. "Isn't it our responsibility," she asks, "to take the initiative to secure the needs of our underprivileged?"

She says she has never had an adverse reaction from Negro audiences. "On the contrary, there have been more than 500 requests for reprints of these speeches."

A similar position was taken recently by another minority group, the "Nisei," of American-born Japanese. In San Francisco, Howard Imazeki, editor of the newspaper, Hobukei Mainichi, said in an editorial:

"We have yet to hear any Negro voices blaming themselves for their social maladjustment.

"What we are trying to say most sincerely here is that the Negro leaders should do a little soul-searching of their own."

Nearly 72 years ago, in Aug. 19, 1891, the New York Mail & Express published a pathetic little item. It said some Negro clergymen had met to discuss means of obtaining "better opportunities" for their people.

Today, the Negro drive is for fully equal opportunity, for everything America offers every citizen.

speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

"How can anyone ask me to be non-violent?" said a Negro war veteran. "That's like putting me back in the line in Korea and loading my rifle with blanks."

Violence begets violence and the possibility of a white counter - reaction has been noted by many observers. "If that happens," said Hodding Carter, editor of the Greenville, Miss., Delta - Democrat, "all hell will break loose."

During the demonstrations in Birmingham last spring, a white taxi driver said to me, "If they kill any white people, I won't ask any questions. I'll just start killin'."

The hour seems late. Is it one minute to 12 now? If so, what raced the hands of the clock?

The story is soon told.

After World War II, the first important federal government action in race relations came when President Truman ordered the end of segregation in the armed forces. He also asked congress for strong civil rights legislation. It was not granted.

During President Eisenhower's second administration, contress enacted the civil rights bills in 1957 an 1960. Using these laws, the administration filed 10 suits on behalf of Negroes' voting rights in the south.

The historic year, however, in the long and anguished struggle over civil rights, was 1954. The U. S. Supreme Court struck down, as unconstitutional, the doctrine of "separate - but - equal" in public schools. Segregation had been a legal fact for 58 years, based on a decision of the supreme court in 1896. Now, the court ordered the schools to be desegregated "with all deliberate speed."

Negroes and their white sympathizers exulted.

But the segregationist, eyeing that phrase, "with all deliberate speed," saw an escape hatch. He determined to resist as long as possible. And he did.

Mob violence exploded in southern and border states.

A climactic point of this stage was Little Rock. The Reporting Service indicate that about 257,000 Negro children are attending public elementary and high schools with white students in 17 southern and border states and the District of Columbia.

Negro leaders say this is about 8 percent of the school-age total.

Apart from the schools, new sectors opened in the fight for civil rights.

In 1955 and 1956, the Southern Christian Leadership (SCLC) Conference, headed by Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King jr., boycotted segregated bus lines in Montgomery, Ala. They won.

The boycott, or "selective buying," as the Negro leaders prefer to say, began coming into play as a potent weapon in other parts of the south. Negro economists estimate that the purchasing power of the Negro, nationally, is around $15 billion a year.

"Selective buying" has put southern businessmen in a vise. If they integrate some facilities after a Negro boycott, they may be hit by a white boycott.

Along with the boycott came the "sit-in," the tactic of simply sitting quietly in a restaurant, seeking service. Or the "kneel-in," crowds of Negroes praying on the steps of a public building or in a main street, stopping traffic.

These maneuvers were pioneered by the Committee on Racial Equality (CORE) which was founded in 1942 at the University of Chicago. It obtained a foothold in the south with the "sit-in" of 1960.

Parallel with action on these fronts, the Negroes began concentrating their efforts in another supremely important field — voter registration. Another Negro organization, the Student Non-Violent Co-ordinating Committee (SNICK) has been active in this work.

The justice department has assisted. Since 1961, it has filed 29 suits against officials for refusing to register qualified Negroes. About 50 percent of these suits have been won.

The Southern Regional Council estimates there are 5,045,000 Negroes of voting age in 11 southern and border states. About one-

It is a long, slow process, but the rigures for Negro registration are rising, spectacularly in some cases. In Bullock County, Ala., there were four registered Negroes in 1961. Now there are 1,451. This, of course, is a special case.

Of the registration drives, Bishop George Barber, of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible Negro voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, north and south."

In all probability, another factor has played a part in the Negro drive for equality, a subtle, unmeasurable factor — the new African nations.

The African Negro has seen African heads of state being received in the White House and getting the red carpet treatment from Soviet Premier Khrushchev and other powerful leaders. He has seen African diplomats speaking from the rostrum of the United Nations.

This has been a source of pride and encouragement.

But it also is a two-edged sword. "An African in a robe and turban can go into a restaurant or a hotel where I can't go," said a Negro public relations man in Washington. "How do you think this makes me feel?"

Then came another catalyst — Birmingham.

Last spring, Negroes there demonstrated in the streets for desegregation of some facilities in downtown stores and the formation of a permanent biracial committee to handle racial problems. So many were arrested that the jail overflowed.

Police dogs and fire hoses were used to disperse the crowds. It was not the first time the dogs had been used in Birmingham. The first time was against white men, rioting around "freedom riders" at a bus station. Nor, of course, was Birmingham the only city to use dogs.

Nevertheless, photographs of dogs leaping to-unemployment. Labor unions have been accused of discriminating against Negroes. Negro leaders are demanding that a certain quota of Negroes shall be employed on given projects, and even in restaurants.

In New York City, to dramatize these and other demands, Negroes entered the offices of Gov. Nelson Rockefeller and stayed for days in a "sit-in." They staged another in the city hall.

Another recent development has been a unifying move among seven Negro organizations, some of which had been sniping at each other. They were the NAACP, CORE, SCLC, SNICK, the National Urban League, the National Council of Negro Women, and the Legal Defense and Education Fund of the NAACP, a separately incorporated organization.

The coalition takes the name council for united civil rights leadership.

"Our primary concern is to eliminate violence," a spokesman said. "We want to provide a cadre of experienced Negro leaders who will prevent things from getting out of hand and keep irresponsible elements from turning to violence."

Distinctly separate from these groups are the "Black Muslims." They demand, not integration, but total segregation on their own terms. They want the federal government to set aside territory in which they propose to set up a Negro state.

Their leader, Muhammad Elijah, lives in Phoenix, Ariz. In answer to the question of whether the "Muslims" hate white people, he said:

"The Bible teaches us to love good and to hate evil. I can't love him (the white) because his is the very essence of evil."

In the vast, complicated and potentially dangerous picture of the racial struggle today, what are the positive sides? The principal ones would seem to be these:

ONE.—Go a greater degree than ever before, the problem is out in the open. More people, especially in the north but in the south, too, are aware of the intricacies and the injustices. More are thinking about it, seeking solutions.

businessmen, clergymen and others, has sought means to desegregate many establishments. He set up a presidential committee on equal job opportunity, replacing two other such committees of the Eisenhower administration. It is headed by Vice President Lyndon Johnson.

FOUR — Congress is hearing testimony on the president's package of civil rights legislation. On June 11, he asked congress to "make a commitment it has not fully made in this century to the proposition that race has no place in American life or law." Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy told the house judiciary Committee, "This bill before you today embodies that commitment."

FIVE — While the Negroes are crying for rights, a Negro lawyer, Mrs. Cora Walker, is making speeches sharply reminding them of their responsibilities. She tells them:

"We are as much to blame for our present condition as the white majority."

On the political side, she says, "There are approximately one million black people in New York City. These Negroes have no restrictions on their voting rights. Yet there are only two elected Negroes in the entire city legislative government."

Of the economic situation, Mrs. Walker says, "In Harlem alone, Negroes spend $150 million a year on automobiles, $80 million on liquor, $75 million on wigs and hair pieces, $100 million on playing the numbers. More than 90 percent of the businesses in our ghettos are owned, controlled and managed by whites outside of the communty. We give minimum support to our own, who are in business or professions."

Of some social facts, she says, "We now are the major statistic in juvenile delinquency, dope addiction, crime, and school drop-outs. Is this why 75 percent of the out-of-wedlock children are born of our race?"

Mrs. Walker suggests that Negroes should do

THE CINCINNATI ENQUIRER
KENTUCKY EDITION
M. 197,218 S. 284,372

AUG 1 1 1963

The Deepening Crisis

Negro's Drive For Equality Wracks Entire U. S.--Not Confined To South

BY RELMAN MORIN
AP Newsfeatures Writer

NEW YORK—The Negro drive for full equality has reached the dimensions of a national convulsion.

It wracks the whole United States, not just the Southern states. It is breaching the invisible racial barriers of the North no less than the visible walls in the South, shattering the complacency of one region, defeating the slow-down strategy of the other.

"Something's got a-hold of me," the Negro is chanting. "We shall overcome," is his anthem.

His movement is in the streets, the courts, the halls of Congress.

It touches schools and employment practices, the seat at a lunch counter and a home in a better neighborhood, the right to vote and the right to worship in any church, the right to sit in any public park and to read a book in any public library—in short, rights of an American citizen and access to equal opportunity.

Starting as nonviolent, his campaign has engineered violence. No one can say whether more will flow, or where, or how much.

"WE WILL advise our people not to use violence," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), at a news conference in Jackson, Miss. "The Negro can't win in a pitched battle with the whites. He's in the minority."

But can the Negro leaders control their followers, everywhere and at all times? Who, for example, speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

"How can anyone ask me to be nonviolent?" said a Negro war veteran. "That's like putting me back in the line in Korea and loading my rifle with blanks."

Violence begets violence and the possibility of a white counter-reaction has been noted by many observers. "If that happens," said Hodding Carter, editor of the Greenville, Miss., Delta-Democrat, "all hell will break loose."

During the demonstrations in Birmingham last spring a white taxi driver said to me, "If they kill any white people, I won't ask any questions. I'll just start killin'."

THE HOUR seems late. Is it one minute to 12 now? If so, what raced the hands of that clock?

The story is soon told.

After World War II the first important Federal government action in race relations came when President Truman ordered the end of segregation in the Armed Forces. He also asked Congress for strong civil rights legislation. It was not granted.

During President Eisenhower's second administration, Congress enacted civil rights bills in 1957 and 1960. Using these laws, the administration filed 10 suits in behalf of Negroes' voting rights in the South.

The historic year, however, in the long and anguished struggle over civil rights, was 1954. The U. S. Supreme Court struck down, as unconstitutional, the doctrine of "separate-but-equal" schools. Segregation had been a legal fact for 58 years, based on a decision of the Supreme Court in 1896. Now, the court ordered the schools to be desegregated "with all deliberate speed."

Negroes and their white sympathizers exulted.

BUT THE segregationist, eyeing that phrase, "with all deliberate speed," saw an escape hatch. He determined to resist as long as possible. And he did.

Mob violence exploded in Southern and border states.

A climactic point of this stage was Little Rock, Ark. The year was 1957. Exactly 80 years after the end of the Reconstruction in the South, Federal troops marched into a southern city again. They used bayonets to disperse crowds around Central High School. And they escorted Negro children into classrooms.

Elsewhere in the South, however, the barriers remained.

Oxford, Miss., and Tuscaloosa, Ala., were still to come.

At Oxford two men died and scores were injured when a Negro, James H. Meredith, enrolled in the University of Mississippi. Again, Federal troops marched, bivouacing on the campus.

At Tuscaloosa, Gov. George C. Wallace stood in the doorway of a University of Alabama building when Justice Department officials attempted to enroll two Negroes, Vivian Malone and James Hood. A few hours later he stepped aside when Federalized units of the National Guard marched onto the campus. There was no violence.

LONG BEFORE these incidents, however, the "bright-new-day" jubilance of 1954 had begun to evaporate.

Negro disappointment, as the years passed with little desegregation, turned to bitterness. "Gradualism," the policy of slowly ending segregation, and "tokenism," permitting only a handful of Negro children in schools, offices or factories, became fighting words.

Today, nearly 10 years after the Supreme Court decision, figures compiled by the Southern Education Reporting Service indicate that about 257,000 Negro children are attending public elementary and high schools with white students in 17 southern and border states and the District of Columbia.

Negro leaders say this is about 8% of the school-age total.

Apart from the schools, new sectors opened in the fight for civil rights.

In 1955 and 1956 the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), headed by the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr., boycotted segregated bus lines in Montgomery, Ala. They won.

The boycott, or "selective buying," as the Negroes prefer to say, began coming into play as a potent weapon in other parts of the South. Negro economists estimate that the purchasing power of the Negro, nationally, is around $15 billion a year.

SELECTIVE BUYING has put the southern businessmen in a vise. If they integrate some facilities after a Negro boycott they may be hit by a white boycott.

Along with the boycott came the "sit-in," the tactic of simply sitting quietly in a restaurant, seeking service. Or the "kneel-in," crowds of Negroes praying on the steps of a public building or in a main street, stopping traffic.

These maneuvers were pioneered by the Congress on Racial Equality (CORE) which was founded in 1942 at the University of Chicago. It obtained a foothold in the South with the "sit-in" of 1960.

Parallel with action on these fronts, the Negroes began concentrating their efforts in another supremely important field — voter registration. Another Negro organization, the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNICK) has been active in this work.

The Justice Department has assisted. Since 1961 it has filed 29 suits against officials for refusing to register qualified Negroes. About 50% of the suits have been won.

THE SOUTHERN Regional Council estimates there are 5,045,999 Negroes of voting age in 11 southern and border states. About one-fourth, some 1,344,000 are registered.

Many tactics have been used to discourage Negroes from registering — gerrymandering, intimidation, widely-spaced meetings of the registration boards, throwing out Negro applications on technicalities.

So concerted voter-registration drives began. Students went through Negro communities, ringing doorbells. Officials stationed themselves in public buildings in the South, buttonholing every Negro who came in, whatever his business, and urging him to register, then and there. Voter "clinics" were set up to instruct Negroes in filling out the application forms and in meeting the technicalities.

It is a long, slow process, but the figures for Negro registration are rising, spectacularily in some cases. In Bullock County, Ala., there were four registered Negroes in 1961. Now there are 1341. This, of course, is a special case.

Of the registration drives Bishop George W. Barber, of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, said: "The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering every single, eligible Negro voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million voters, North and South."

IN ALL probability another factor has played a part in the Negro drive for equality, a subtle, unmeasurable factor — the new African nations.

The American Negro has seen African heads of state being received in the White House and getting the red carpet treatment from Soviet Premier Khrushchev and other powerful leaders. He has seen African diplomats speaking from the rostrum of the United Nations.

This has been a source of pride and encouragement.

But it also has been a two-edged sword. "An African in a robe and turban can go into a restaurant or hotel where demanding that a certain quota of Negroes shall be employed on given projects, and even in restaurants.

IN NEW YORK CITY, to dramatize these and other demands, Negroes entered the offices of Gov. Nelson Rockefeller and stayed for days in a "sit-in." They staged another in the City Hall.

Another recent development has been a unifying move among seven Negro organizations, some of which had been sniping at each other. They were the NAACP, CORE, SNICK, SCLC, the National Urban League, the National Council of Negro Women, and the Legal Defense and Education Fund of the NAACP, a separately incorporated organization.

The coalition takes the name Council for United Civil Rights Leadership.

"Our primary concern is to eliminate violence," a spokesman said. "We want

More are thinking about it, seeking solutions.

• Some degree of communication between the races is being restored in the South. Communications, Southerners say, generally tended to break down after the Supreme Court decision of the schools in 1954. Now, fitfully and with difficulty, Negroes and whites in some parts of the South are sitting down together again. One Southern newspaper publisher called such a meeting in his own plant—and deliberately placed the conference table where it could be seen through the window from the sidewalk.

• PRESIDENT Kennedy, in conferences with scores of southern businessmen, clergymen and others, has sought means to desegregate many establishments. He set up a Presidential committee on equal job opportunity, replacing two other such committees of the Eisenhower administration. It is headed by Vice

EDITOR'S NOTE—Relman Morin, author of this last in a series of Associated Press articles on the integration struggle, is preparing a follow-up article outlining progress to date in integration activities around the country. It will cover schools, employment and desegregation of facilities and will be carried in The Enquirer. Watch for it!

POLICE DOGS have been used against both whites and Negroes in the racial conflict. In Baltimore, left, police and dogs converge on whites protesting integration of a swimming pool. In Birmingham, Ala., dogs were used by police to disperse Negro demonstrators.

—AP Newsfeatures Photo

WHAT LIES IN the future for this young Negro family walking along a Harlem street in New York? Will the Negro drive for equality be successful in their lifetime? Will the future hold a discrimination-free life of opportunity for their children?

THE CINCINNATI ENQUIRER features
Section H
Sunday, August 11, 1963

used against both whites and Negroes in the racial police and dogs converge on whites protesting integra-
In Birmingham, Ala., dogs were used by police to disperse Negro demonstrators.

So concerted voter-registration drives began. Students went through Negro communities, ringing doorbells. Officials stationed themselves in public buildings in the South, buttonholing every Negro who came in, whatever his business, and urging him to register, then and there. Voter "clinics" were set up to instruct Negroes in filling out the application forms and in meeting the technicalities.

It is a long, slow process, but the figures for Negro registration are rising, spectacularily in some cases. In Bullock County, Ala., there were four registered Negroes in 1961. Now there are 1341. This, of course, is a special case.

Of the registration drives Bishop George W. Barber, of the African Methodist istering every single, eligible Negro voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million voters, North and South."

IN ALL probability another factor has played a part in the Negro drive for equality, a subtle, unmeasurable factor — the new African nations.

The American Negro has seen African heads of state being received in the White House and getting the red carpet treatment from Soviet Premier Khrushchev and other powerful leaders. He has seen African diplomats speaking from the rostrum of the United Nations.

This has been a source of pride and encouragement.

But it also has been a two-edged sword. "An African in a robe and turban can go into a restaurant or hotel where I can't go," said a Negro public relations man in Washington. "How silly can segregation be? How do you think this makes me feel?"

Then came another catalyst—Birmingham.

Last spring Negroes there demonstrated in the streets for desegregation of some facilities in downtown stores and the formation of a permanent biracial committee to handle racial problems. So many were arrested that the jails overflowed.

Police dogs and fire hoses were used to disperse the crowds. It was not the first time the dogs had been used in Birmingham. The first time it was against white men, rioting around "Freedom Riders" at a bus station. Nor, of course, was Birmingham the only city to use dogs.

NEVERTHELESS, photographs of dogs leaping toward Negroes went around the globe.

For some reason Birmingham appears to have dramatized the Negro struggle more than any other incident.

"Birmingham engineered the revolution that began in the spring of 1963," Martin Ochs, editor of the Chattanooga Times, said in a recent speech at the University of Wisconsin.

Fear of violence and economic trouble has fostered a "mood of reconciliation" toward racial integration in the South, Mr. Ochs said.

Almost overnight after Birmingham, too, Negro demonstrations erupted in the North. Violence flared in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and other Northern cities. The Los Angeles Times published a cartoon depicting two Negro figures, one in a menacing posture. It was captioned, "Integration Not Intimidation."

In the North, Negro demands focus mainly on jobs and housing. Negro unemployment is high, more than double white unemployment. Labor unions have been accused of discriminating against Negroes. Negro leaders are

IN NEW YORK CITY, to dramatize these and other demands, Negroes entered the offices of Gov. Nelson Rockefeller and stayed for days in a "sit-in." They staged another in the City Hall.

Another recent development has been a unifying move among seven Negro organizations, some of which had been sniping at each other. They were the NAACP, CORE, SNICK, SCLC, the National Urban League, the National Council of Negro Women, and the Legal Defense and Education Fund of the NAACP, a separately incorporated organization.

The coalition takes the name Council for United Civil Rights Leadership.

"Our primary concern is to eliminate violence," a spokesman said. "We want to provide a cadre of experienced Negro leaders who will prevent things from getting out of hand and keep irresponsible elements from turning to violence."

Distinctly separate from these groups are the "Black Muslims." They demand, not integration, but total segregation on their own terms. They want the Federal government to set aside territory in which they propose to set up a Negro State.

Their leader, Muhammad Elijah, lives in Phoenix, Arizona. In answer to the question of whether the "Muslins" hate white people,

"THE BIBLE teaches us to love good and to hate evil. I can't love him (the white) because his is the very essence of evil."

In the vast, complicated and potentially dangerous picture of the racial struggle today, what are the positive sides? The principal ones would seem to be these: races is being restored in the South. Communications, Southerners say, generally tended to break down after the Supreme Court decision of the schools in 1954. Now, fitfully and with difficulty, Negroes and whites in some parts of the South are sitting down together again. One Southern newspaper publisher called such a meeting in his own plant—and deliberately placed the conference table where it could be seen through the window from the sidewalk.

• To a greater degree than ever before, the problem is out in the open. More people, especially in the North but in the South, too, are aware of the intricacies and the injustices.

• PRESIDENT Kennedy, in conferences with scores of southern businessmen, clergymen and others, has sought means to desegregate many establishments. He set up a Presidential committee on equal job opportunity, replacing two other such committees of the Eisenhower administration. It is headed by Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson.

• Congress is hearing testimony on the President's package of civil rights legislation. On June 11, he asked Congress to "make a commitment it has not fully made in this century to the proposition that race has no place in American life or law." Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy told the House Judiciary Committee, "This bill before you today embodies that commitment."

TO DRAMATIZE demands for jobs and housing in the North, Negroes staged "sit-ins"—here in the office of New York's Mayor Wagner.

• While the Negroes are crying for rights, a Negro lawyer, Mrs. Cora T. Walker, is making speeches sharply reminding them of their responsibilities. She tells them: "We are as much to blame for our present condition as the white majority."

Nearly 72 years ago, on August 19, 1891, the New York Mail & Express published a pathetic little item. It said some Negro clergymen had met to discuss means of obtaining "better opportunities" for their people.

Today, the Negro drive is for fully equal opportunity, for everything America offers every citizen.

SARASOTA, FLA.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
D. 22,796 S. 25,964

AUG 11 1963

THE DEEPENING CRISIS

Negro Goal: Everything America Offers Its Citizens

By RELMAN MORIN

NEW YORK (AP)—The Negro drive for full equality has reached the dimensions of a national convulsion.

13th Of A Series

It wracks the whole United States, not just the Southern states. It is breaching the invisible racial barriers of the North no less than the visible walls in the South, shattering the complacency of one region, defeating the slow-down strategy of the other.

"Something's got a-hold of me," the Negro is chanting. "We shall overcome," is his anthem.

His movement is in the streets, the courts, the halls of Congress.

It touches schools and employment practices, a seat at a lunch counter and a home in a better neighborhood, the right to vote and the right to worship in any church, the right to sit in any public park and to read a book in any public library—in short, the rights of an American citizen and access to equal opportunity.

Starting as nonviolent, his campaign has engendered violence. The blood of both races has been spilled. No one can say whether more will flow, or where, or how much.

"We will advise our people not to use violence," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, at a news conference in Jackson, Miss. "The Negro can't win in a pitched battle with the whites. He's in the minority."

But can the Negro leaders control their followers, everywhere and at all times? Who, for example, speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

"How can anyone ask me to be nonviolent?" said a Negro war veteran. "That's like putting me back in the line in Korea and loading my rifle with blanks."

Violence begets violence and the possibility of a white counter-reaction has been noted by many observers. "If that happens," said Hodding Carter, editor of the Greenville, Miss., Delta-Democrat, "all hell will break loose."

During the demonstrations in Birmingham last spring, a white taxi driver said to me, "If they kill any white people, I won't ask any questions. I'll just start killin'."

The hour seems late. Is it one minute to 12 now? If so, what raced the hands of the clock?

The story is soon told.

After World War II, the first important federal government action in race relations came when President Truman ordered the end of segregation in the armed forces. He also asked Congress for strong civil rights legislation. It was not granted.

During President Eisenhower's second administration, Congress jubilance of 1954 had begun to evaporate.

Negro disappointment, as the years passed with little desegregation, turned to bitterness. "Gradualism," the policy of slowly ending segregation, and "tokenism," permitting only a handful of Negro children in schools, offices or factories, became fighting words.

Today, nearly 10 years after the Supreme Court decision, figures compiled by the Southern Education Reporting Service indicate that about 257,000 Negro children are attending public elementary and high schools with white students in 17 Southern and border states and the District of Columbia.

Negro leaders say this is about 8 per cent of the school-age total.

Apart from the schools, new sectors opened in the fight for civil rights.

In 1955 and 1956, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, headed by the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., boycotted segregated bus lines in Montgomery, Ala. They won.

The boycott, or "selective buying," as the Negro leaders prefer to say, began coming into play as a potent weapon in other parts of the South. Negro economists estimate that the purchasing power of the Negro, nationally, is around $15 billion a year.

"Selective buying" has put Southern businessmen in a vise. If they integrate some facilities after a Negro boycott, they may be hit by a white boycott.

Along with the boycott came the "sit-in," the tactic of simply sitting quietly in a restaurant, seeking service. Or the "kneel-in," crowds of Negroes praying on the steps of a public building or in a main street, stopping traffic.

These maneuvers were pioneered by the Congress of Racial Equality, which was founded in 1942 at the University of Chicago. It obtained a foothold in the South with the sit-ins of 1960.

Parallel with action on these fronts, the Negroes began concentrating their efforts in another supremely important field — voter registration. Another Negro organization, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee — "SNICK"—has been active in this work.

The Justice Department has assisted. Since 1961, it has filed 29 suits against officials for refusing to register qualified Negroes. About 50 per cent of these suits have been won.

The Southern Regional Council estimates there are 5,045,000 Negroes of voting age in 11 Southern and border states. About one-fourth, some 1,344,000, are registered.

Many tactics have been used to discourage Negroes from registering — gerrymandering, intimidation, widely-spaced meetings of registration boards, throwing out Negro applications on technicalities.

So concerted voter-registration drives began. Students went through Negro communities, ringing doorbells. Officials stationed themselves in public buildings in the South, buttonholing every Negro who came in, whatever his business, and urging him to register, there and then. Voter "clinics" were set up to instruct Negroes in filling out the application forms, and in meeting the technicalities.

It is a long, slow process, but the figures for Negro registration are rising, spectacularly in some cases.

In all probability, another factor has played a part in the Negro drive for equality, a subtle, unmeasurable factor—the new African nations.

The American Negro has seen African heads of state being received in the White House and getting the red carpet treatment from Soviet Premier Khrushchev and other powerful leaders. He has seen African diplomats speaking from the rostrum of the United Nations.

This has been a source of pride and encouragement.

But it also is a two-edged sword. "An African in a robe and turban can go into a restaurant or a hotel where I can't go," said a Negro public relations man in Washington. "How silly can segregation be? How do you think this makes me feel?"

Then came another catalyst—Birmingham.

Last spring, Negroes there demonstrated in the streets for desegregation of some facilities in downtown stores and the formation of a permanent biracial committee to handle racial problems. So many were arrested that the jails overflowed.

Police dogs and fire hoses were used to disperse the crowds. It was not the first time the dogs had been used in Birmingham. The first time was against white men, rioting around "freedom riders" at a bus station. Nor, of course, was Birmingham the only city to use dogs.

Nevertheless, photographs of dogs leaping toward Negroes went around the globe.

For some reason, Birmingham appears to have dramatized the Negro struggle more than any other incident.

Fear of violence and economic trouble has fostered a "mood of reconciliation" toward racial integration in the south, Ochs said.

Almost overnight after Birmingham, too, Negro demonstrations erupted in the North. Violence flared in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and other Northern cities. The Los Angeles Times published a cartoon depicting two Negro figures, one in a menacing posture. It was captioned, "Integration, not intimidation."

In the North, Negro demands focus mainly on jobs and housing. Negro unemployment is high, more than double white unemployment. Labor unions have been accused of discriminating against Negroes.

In New York City, to dramatize these and other demands, Negroes entered the offices of Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller and stayed for days in a sit-in. They staged another in the City Hall.

Another recent development has been a unifying move among seven Negro organizations, some of which had been sniping at each other. They were the NAACP, CORE, SCLC, "SNICK," the National Urban League, the National Council of Negro Women, and the Legal Defense and Education Fund of the NAACP, a separately incorporated organization.

The coalition takes the name Council for United Civil Rights Leadership.

Distinctly separate from these groups are the Black Muslims. They demand, not integration, but total segregation on their own terms. They want the federal government to set aside territory in which they propose to set up a Negro state.

Their leader, Muhammad Elijah, lives in Phoenix, Ariz. In answer to the question of whether the Muslims hate white people, he said:

"The Bible teaches us to love good and to hate evil. I can't love him (the white) because his is the very essence of evil."

In the vast, complicated and potentially dangerous picture of the racial struggle today, what are the positive sides? The principal ones would seem to be these:

1. To a greater degree than ever before, the problem is out in the open. More people, especially in the North but in the South, too, are aware of the intricacies and the injustices. More are thinking about it, seeking solutions.

2. Some degree of communication between the races is being restored in the South. Communications, Southerners say, generally tended to break down after the Supreme Court decision on the schools in 1954. Now, fitfully and with difficulty, Negroes and whites in some parts of the South are sitting down together again. One Southern newspaper publisher called such a meeting in his own plant—and deliberately placed the conference table where it could be seen through the window from the sidewalk.

3. President Kennedy, in conferences with scores of Southern businessmen, clergymen and others, has sought means to desegregate many establishments. He set up a presidential committee on equal job opportunity, replacing two other such committees of the Eisenhower administration. It is headed by Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson.

4. Congress is hearing testimony on the President's package of civil rights legislation. On June 11, he asked Congress to "make a commitment it has not fully made in this century to the proposition that race has no place in American life or law." Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy told the House Judiciary Committee, "This bill before you today embodies that commitment."

5. While the Negroes are crying for rights, a Negro lawyer, Cora T. Walker, is making speeches sharply reminding them of their responsibilities.

She tells them: "We are as much to blame for our present condition as the white majority."

On the political side, she says, "There are approximately one million black people in New York City. These Negroes have no restrictions on their voting rights. Yet there are only two elected Negroes in the entire city legislative government."

Of the economic situation, Mrs. Walker says, "In Harlem alone, Negroes spend $150 million a year on automobiles, $80 million on liquor, $75 million on wigs and hair pieces, $100 million on playing the numbers. More than 90 per cent of the businesses in our ghettos are owned, controlled and managed by whites outside of the community. We give minimum support to our own, who are in businesses or professions."

Of some social facts, she says, "We now are the major statistic in juvenile delinquency, dope addiction, crime, and school dropouts. Is this why 75 per cent of the out-of-wedlock children are born of our race?"

Mrs. Walker suggests that Negroes should do more to help each other. "Isn't it our responsibility," she asks, "to take the initiative to secure the needs of our underprivileged?"

She says she has never had an adverse reaction from Negro audiences. "On the contrary, there have been more than 500 requests for reprints of these speeches."

A similar position was taken recently by another minority group, the Nisei, or American-born Japanese. In San Francisco, Howard Imazeki, editor of the newspaper, Hobukei Mainichi, said in an editorial:

"We have yet to hear any Negro voices blaming themselves for their social maladjustment.

"What we are trying to say most sincerely here is that the Negro leaders should do a little soul-searching of their own."

Nearly 72 years ago, on Aug. 19, 1891, the New York Mail & Express published a pathetic little item. It said some Negro clergymen had met to discuss means of obtaining "better opportunities" for their people.

Today, the Negro drive is for fully equal opportunity, for everything America offers every citizen.

ment practices, a seat at a lunch counter and a home in a better neighborhood, the right to vote and the right to worship in any church, the right to sit in any public park and to read a book in any public library—in short, the rights of an American citizen and access to equal opportunity.

Starting as nonviolent, his campaign has engendered violence. The blood of both races has been spilled. No one can say whether more will flow, or where, or how much.

"We will advise our people not to use violence," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, at a news conference in Jackson, Miss. "The Negro can't win in a pitched battle with the whites. He's in the minority."

But can the Negro leaders control their followers, everywhere and at all times? Who, for example, speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

"How can anyone ask me to be nonviolent?" said a Negro war veteran. "That's like putting me back in the line in Korea and loading my rifle with blanks."

Violence begets violence and the possibility of a white counter-reaction has been noted by many observers. "If that happens," said Hodding Carter, editor of the Greenville, Miss., Delta-Democrat, "all hell will break loose."

During the demonstrations in Birmingham last spring, a white taxi driver said to me, "If they kill any white people, I won't ask any questions. I'll just start killin'."

The hour seems late. Is it one minute to 12 now? If so, what raced the hands of the clock?

The story is soon told.

After World War II, the first important federal government action in race relations came when President Truman ordered the end of segregation in the armed forces. He also asked Congress for strong civil rights legislation. It was not granted.

During President Eisenhower's second administration, Congress enacted civil rights bills in 1957 and 1960. Using these laws, the administration filed 10 suits on behalf of Negroes' voting rights in the South.

The historic year, however, in the long and anguished struggle over civil rights, was 1954. The U.S. Supreme Court struck down, as unconstitutional, the doctrine of "separate-but-equal" in public schools. Segregation had been a legal fact for 58 years, based on a decision of the Supreme Court in 1896. Now, the court-ordered the schools to be desegregated "with all deliberate speed."

Negroes and their white sympathizers exulted.

But the segregationist, eying that phrase, "with all deliberate speed," saw an escape hatch. He determined to resist as long as possible. And he did.

Mob violence exploded in Southern and border states.

A climactic point of this stage was Little Rock, Ark. The year was 1957. Exactly 80 years after the end of the reconstruction in the South, federal troops marched into a Southern city again. They used bayonets to disperse crowds around Central High School. And they escorted Negro children into classrooms.

Elsewhere in the South, However, the barriers remained.

Oxford, Miss., and Tuscaloosa, Ala., were still to come.

At Oxford, two men died and scores were injured when a Negro, James H. Meredith, enrolled in the University of Mississippi. Again, federal troops parched, bivouacing on the campus.

At Tuscaloosa, Gov. George C. Wallace stood in the doorway of a University of Alabama building when Justice Department officials attempted to enroll two Negroes, Vivian Maline and James Hood. A few hours later, he stepped aside when federalized units of the National Guard marched onto the campus. There was no violence.

Long before these incidents, however, the "bright-new-day" sectors opened in the fight for civil rights.

In 1955 and 1956, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, headed by the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., boycotted segregated bus lines in Montgomery, Ala. They won.

The boycott, or "selective buying," as the Negro leaders prefer to say, began coming into play as a potent weapon in other parts of the South. Negro economists estimate that the purchasing power of the Negro, nationally, is around $15 billion a year.

"Selective buying" has put Southern businessmen in a vise. If they integrate some facilities after a Negro boycott, they may be hit by a white boycott.

Along with the boycott came the "sit-in," the tactic of simply sitting quietly in a restaurant, seeking service. Or the "kneel-in," crowds of Negroes praying on the steps of a public building or in a main street, stopping traffic.

These maneuvers were pioneered by the Congress of Racial Equality, which was founded in 1942 at the University of Chicago. It obtained a foothold in the South with the sit-ins of 1960.

Parallel with action on these fronts, the Negroes began concentrating their efforts in another supremely important field — voter registration. Another Negro organization, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee — "SNICK"—has been active in this work.

The Justice Department has assisted. Since 1961, it has filed 29 suits against officials for refusing to register qualified Negroes. About 50 per cent of these suits have been won.

The Southern Regional Council estimates there are 5,045,000 Negroes of voting age in 11 Southern and border states. About one-fourth, some 1,344,000, are registered.

Many tactics have been used to discourage Negroes from registering — gerrymandering, intimidation, widely-spaced meetings of registration boards, throwing out African heads of state being received in the White House and getting the red carpet treatment from Soviet Premier Khrushchev and other powerful leaders. He has seen African diplomats speaking from the rostrum of the United Nations.

This has been a source of pride and encouragement.

But it also is a two-edged sword. "An African in a robe and turban can go into a restaurant or a hotel where I can't go," said a Negro public relations man in Washington. "How silly can segregation be? How do you think this makes me feel?"

Then came another catalyst—Birmingham.

Last spring, Negroes there demonstrated in the streets for desegregation of some facilities in downtown stores and the formation of a permanent biracial committee to handle racial problems. So many were arrested that the jails overflowed.

Police dogs and fire hoses were used to disperse the crowds. It was not the first time the dogs had been used in Birmingham. The first time was against white men, rioting around "freedom riders" at a bus station. Nor, of course, was Birmingham the only city to use dogs.

Nevertheless, photographs of dogs leaping toward Negroes went around the globe.

For some reason, Birmingham appears to have dramatized the Negro struggle more than any other incident.

Fear of violence and economic trouble has fostered a "mood of reconciliation" toward racial integration in the south, Ochs said.

Almost overnight after Birmingham, too, Negro demonstrations erupted in the North. Violence flared in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and other Northern cities. The Los Angeles Times published a cartoon depicting two Negro figures, one in a menacing posture. It was captioned, "Integration, not intimidation."

In the North, Negro demands focus mainly on jobs and housing.

Distinctly separate from these groups are the Black Muslims. They demand, not integration, but total segregation on their own terms. They want the federal government to set aside territory in which they propose to set up a Negro state.

tended to break down Supreme Court decision schools in 1954. Now, fit with difficulty, Negro whites in some parts of are sitting down togethe
One Southern newspaper called such a meeting in RACINE, WIS.

BULLETIN
SUN. 32,823

AUG 11 1963

The Deepening Crisis

A 'Summing Up' of Integration Struggle

Editor's Note: Caught in the turmoil of a summer of bitter racial discord, Americans find it difficult at times to assess the dimensions of the crisis, to know what has been gained or lost and where we are heading now. Here, in the last of a special series of Associated Press articles on the integration struggle, is a report by a correspondent who has covered it closely.

—

By Relman Morin

NEW YORK—(AP)—The Negro drive for full equality has reached the dimensions of a national convulsion.

It wracks the whole United States, not just the Southern states. It is breaching the invisible racial barriers of the North no less than the visible walls in the South, shattering the complacency of one region, defeating the slow-down strategy of the other.

"Something's got a-hold of me," the Negro is chanting. "We shall overcome," is his anthem.

His movement is in the streets, the courts, the halls of Congress.

It touches schools and employment practices, a seat at a lunch counter and a home in a better neighborhood, the right to vote and the right to worship in any church, the right to sit in any public park and to read a book in any public library—in short, the rights of an American citizen and access to equal opportunity.

Starting as non-violent, his campaign has engendered violence. The blood of both races has been spilled. No one can say whether more will flow, or where, or how much.

Oppose Violence

"We will advise our people not to use violence," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), at a news conference in Jackson, Miss. "The Negro can't win in a pitched battle with the whites. He's in the minority."

But can the Negro leaders control their followers, everywhere and at all times? Who, for example, speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

"How can anyone ask me to be non-violent?" said a Negro war veteran. "That's like putting me back in the line in Korea and loading my rifle with blanks."

Violence begets violence loosa, Ala., were still to come.

At Oxford, two men died and scores were injured when a Negro, James H. Meredith, enrolled in the University of Mississippi. Again, federal troops marched, bivouacing on the campus.

Doorway Obstinacy

At Tuscaloosa, Gov. George C. Wallace stood in the doorway of a University of Alabama building when Justice Department officials attempted to enrol two Negroes, Vivian Malone and James Hood. A few hours later, he stepped aside when federalized units of the National Guard marched onto the campus. There was no violence.

Long before these incidents, however, the "bright-new-day" jubilance of 1954 had begun to evaporate.

Negro disappointment, as the years passed with little desegreation, turned to bitterness. "Gradualism," the policy of slowly ending segregation, and "tokenism," permitting only a handful of Negro children in schools, offices or factories, became fighting words.

Today, nearly 10 years after the Supreme Court decision, figures compiled by the Southern Education Reporting Service indicate that about 257,000 Negro children are attending public elementary and tion boards, throwing out Negro applications on technicalities.

Vote Drive Launched

So concerted voter-registration drives began. Students went through Negro communities, ringing doorbells. Officials stationed themselves in public buildings in the South, buttonholing every Negro who came in, whatever his business, and urging him to register, there and then. Voter "clinics" were set up to instruct Negroes in filling out the application forms, and in meeting the technicalities.

It is a long, slow process, but the figures for Negro registration are rising, spectacularly in some cases. In Bullock County, Ala., there were four registered Negroes in 1961. Now there are 1,341. This, of course, is a special case.

Of the registration drives, Bishop George W. Barber, of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible Negro voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

African Nations' Link

In all probability, another factor has played a part in the Negro drive for equality, a subtle, unmeasurable factor—the new African nations.

The American Negro has seen African heads of state being received in the White House and getting the red carpet treatment from Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev and other powerful leaders. He has seen African diplomats speaking from the rostrum of the United Nations.

This has been a source of pride and encouragement.

But it also is a two-edged sword. "An African in a robe and turban can go into a restaurant or a hotel where I can't go," said a Negro public relations man in Washington. "How silly can segregation be? How do you think this makes me feel?"

Then came another catalyst—Birmingham.

Another recent development has been a unifying move among seven Negro organizations, some of which had been sniping at each other. They were the NAACP, CORE, SCLC, "SNICK," the National Urban League, the National Council of Negro Women, and the Legal Defense and Education Fund of the NAACP, a separately incorporated organization.

The coalition takes the name COUNCIL for United Civil Rights Leadership.

"Our primary concern is to eliminate violence," a spokesman said. "We want to provide a cadre of experienced Negro leaders who will prevent things from getting out of hand and keep irresponsible elements from turning to violence."

Distinctly separate from these groups are the "Black Muslims." They demand, not integration, but total segregation on their own terms. They want the federal government to set aside territory in which they propose to set up a Negro state.

Muslims on Hate

Their leader, Muhammad Elijah, lives in Phoenix, Ariz. In answer to the question of whether the "Muslims" hate white people, he said:

"The Bible teaches us to love good and to hate evil. I can't love him (the white) because he is the very essence of evil."

In the vast, complicated and potentially dangerous picture of the racial struggle today, what are the positive sides? The principal ones would seem to be these:

1. To a greater degree than ever before, the problem is out in the open. More people, especially in the North but in the South, too, are aware of the intricacies and the injustices. More are thinking about it, seeking solutions.

2. Some degree of communication between the races is being restored in the South. Communications, Southerners say, generally tended to break down after the Supreme Court decision on the schools in 1954. Now, fitfully and with difficulty, Negroes and whites in some parts of the South cent of the businesses in our ghettos are owned, controlled and managed by whites outside of the community. We give minimum support to our own, who are in businesses or professions."

Of some social facts, she says, "We now are the major statistic in juvenile delinquency, dope addiction, crime, and school drop-outs. Is this why 75 per cent of the out-of-wedlock children are born of our race?"

Mrs. Walker suggests that Negroes should do more to help each other. "Isn't it our responsibility," she asks, "to take the initiative to secure the needs of our underprivileged?"

No Consternation

She says she has never had an adverse reaction from Negro audiences. "On the contrary, there have been more than 500 requests for reprints of these speeches."

A similar position was taken recently by another minority group, the "Nisei," or American-born Japanese. In San Francisco, Howard Imazeki, editor of the newspaper, Hobukei Mainichi, said in an editorial:

"We have yet to hear any Negro voices blaming themselves for their social maladjustment.

"What we are trying to say most sincerely here is that the Negro leaders should do a little soul-searching of their own."

Nearly 72 years ago, on Aug. 19, 1891, the New York Mail & Express published a pathetic little item. It said some Negro clergymen had met to discuss means of obtaining "better opportunities" for their people.

Today, the Negro drive is for fully equal opportunity, for everything America offers every citizen.

lence. The blood of both races has been spilled. No one can say whether more will flow, or where, or how much.

Oppose Violence

"We will advise our people not to use violence," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), at a news conference in Jackson, Miss. "The Negro can't win in a pitched battle with the whites. He's in the minority."

But can the Negro leaders control their followers, everywhere and at all times? Who, for example, speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

"How can anyone ask me to be non-violent?" said a Negro war veteran. "That's like putting me back in the line in Korea and loading my rifle with blanks."

Violence begets violence and the possibility of a white counter-reaction has been noted by many observers. "If that happens," said Hodding Carter, editor of the Greenville, Miss., Delta-Democrat, "all hell will break loose."

During the demonstrations in Birmingham last spring, a white taxi driver said to me, "If they kill any white people, I won't ask any questions. I'll just start killin'."

The Post War Origins

The hour seems late. Is it one minute to 12 now? If so, what raced the hands of the clock?

The story is soon told.

After World War II, the first important federal government action in race relations came when President Truman ordered the end of segregation in the armed forces. He also asked Congress for strong civil rights legislation. It was not granted.

During President Eisenhower's second administration, Congress enacted civil rights bills in 1957 and 1960. Using these laws, the administration filed 10 suits on behalf of Negroes' voting rights in the South.

The historic year, however, in the long and anguished struggle over civil rights, was 1954. The U.S. Supreme Court struck down, as unconstitutional, the doctrine of "separate-but-equal" in public schools. Segregation had been a legal fact for 58 years, based on a decision of the Supreme Court in 1896. Now, the court ordered the schools to be desegregated "with all deliberate speed."

Time for Joy

Negroes and their white sympathizers exulted.

But the segregationist, eying that phrase, "with all deliberate speed," saw an escape hatch. He determined to resist as long as possible. And he did.

Mob violence exploded in Southern and Border states.

A climactic point of this stage was Little Rock, Ark. The year was 1957. Exactly 80 years after the end of the reconstruction in the South, federal troops marched into a Southern city again. They used bayonets to disperse crowds around Central High School. And they escorted Negro children into classrooms.

Elsewhere in the South, however, the barriers remained.

Oxford, Miss., and Tuscaloosa, Ala., had to enroll two Negroes, Vivian Malone and James Hood. A few hours later, he stepped aside when federalized units of the National Guard marched onto the campus. There was no violence.

Long before these incidents, however, the "bright-new-day" jubilance of 1954 had begun to evaporate.

Negro disappointment, as the years passed with little desegreation, turned to bitterness. "Gradualism," the policy of slowly ending segregation, and "tokenism," permitting only a handful of Negro children in schools, offices or factories, became fighting words.

Today, nearly 10 years after the Supreme Court decision, figures compiled by the Southern Education Reporting Service indicate that about 257,000 Negro children are attending public elementary and high schools with white students in 17 Southern and Border states and the District of Columbia.

8% of Total

Negro leaders say this is about eight per cent of the school-age total.

Apart from the schools, new sectors opened in the fight for civil rights.

In 1955 and 1956, the Southern Christian Leadership (SCLC) Conference, headed by the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., boycotted segregated bus lines in Montgomery, Ala. They won.

The boycott, or "selective buying," as the Negro leaders prefer to say, began coming into play as a potent weapon in other parts of the South. Negro economists estimate that the purchasing power of the Negro, nationally, is around $15 billion a year.

"Selective buying" has put Southern businessmen in a vise. If they integrate some facilities after a Negro boycott, they may be hit by a white boycott.

Along with the boycott came the "sit-in," the tactic of simply sitting quietly in a restaurant, seeking service. Or the "kneel-in," crowds of Negroes praying on the steps of a public building or in a main street, stopping traffic.

The Pioneers

These maneuvers were pioneered by the Committee on Racial Equality (CORE) which was founded in 1942 at the University of Chicago. It obtained a foothold in the South with the "sit-in" of 1960.

Parallel with action on these fronts, the Negroes began concentrating their efforts in another supremely important field—voter registration. Another Negro organization, the Student Non-Violent Co-ordinating Committee ("SNICK") has been active in this work.

The Justice Department has assisted. Since 1961, it has filed 29 suits against officials for refusing to register qualified Negroes. About 50 per cent of these suits have been won.

The Southern Regional Council estimates there are 5,045,000 Negroes of voting age in 11 Southern and Border states. About one fourth, some 1,344,000, are registered.

Many tactics have been used to discourage Negroes from registering—gerrymandering, intimidation, widely-spaced meetings of registrars.

factor has played a part in the Negro drive for equality, a subtle, unmeasurable factor—the new African nations.

The American Negro has seen African heads of state being received in the White House and getting the red carpet treatment from Soviet Premier Nikita Khrushchev and other powerful leaders. He has seen African diplomats speaking from the rostrum of the United Nations.

This has been a source of pride and encouragement.

But it also is a two-edged sword. "An African in a robe and turban can go into a restaurant or a hotel where I can't go," said a Negro public relations man in Washington. "How silly can segregation be? How do you think this makes me feel?"

Then came another catalyst—Birmingham.

Last spring, Negroes there demonstrated in the streets for desegregation of some facilities in downtown stores and the formation of a permanant bi-racial committee to handle racial problems. So many were arrested that the jails overflowed.

Dogs and Hoses

Police dogs and fire hoses were used to disperse the crowds. It was not the first time the dogs had been used in Birmingham. The first time was against white men, rioting around "freedom riders" at a bus station. Nor, of course, was Birmingham the only city to use dogs.

Nevertheless, photographs of dogs leaping toward Negroes went around the globe.

For some reason, Birmingham appears to have dramatized the Negro struggle more than any other incident.

"Birmingham engineered the revolution that began in the spring of 1963," Martin Ochs, editor of the Chattanooga Times, said in a recent speech at the University of Wisconsin.

Fear of violence and economic trouble has fostered a "mood of reconciliation" toward racial integration in the South, Ochs said.

Almost overnight after Birmingham, too, Negro demonstrations erupted in the North. Violence flared in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and other Northern cities. The Los Angeles Times published a cartoon depicting two Negro figures, one in a menacing posture. It was captioned, "Integration not intimidation."

Job, Housing Demands

In the North, Negro demands focus mainly on jobs and housing. Negro unemployment is high, more than double white unemployment. Labor unions have been accused of discriminating against Negroes. Negro leaders are demanding that a certain quota of Negroes shall be employed on given projects, and even in restaurants.

I can't love him (the white) because he is the very essence of evil."

In the vast, complicated and potentially dangerous picture of the racial struggle today, what are the positive sides? The principal ones would seem to be these:

1. To a greater degree than ever before, the problem is out in the open. More people, especially in the North but in the South, too, are aware of the intricacies and the injustices. More are thinking about it, seeking solutions.

2. Some degree of communication between the races is being restored in the South. Communications, Southerners say, generally tended to break down after the Supreme Court decision on the schools in 1954. Now, fitfully and with difficulty, Negroes and whites in some parts of the South are sitting down together again. One Southern newspaper publisher called such a meeting in his own plant—and deliberately placed the conference table where it could be seen through the window from the sidewalk.

President's Efforts

3. President Kennedy, in conferences with scores of Southern businessmen, clergymen and others, has sought means to desegregate many establishments. He set up a Presidential Committee on Equal Job Opportunity, replacing two other such committees of the Eisenhower administration. It is headed by Vice Pres. Lyndon B. Johnson.

4. Congress is hearing testimony on the president's package of civil rights legislation. On June 11, he asked Congress to "make a commitment it has not fully made in this century to the proposition that race has no place in American life or law." Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy told the House Judiciary Committee, "This bill before you today embodies that commitment."

5. While the Negroes are crying for rights, a Negro lawyer, Mrs. Cora T. Walker, is making speeches sharply reminding them of their responsibilities. She tells them:

"We are as much to blame for our present condition as the white majority."

Blames Own Race

On the political side, she says, "there are approximately one million black people in New York City. These Negroes have no restrictions on their voting rights. Yet there are only two elected Negroes in the entire city legislative government."

Of the economic situation, Mrs. Walker says, "In Harlem alone, Negroes spend $150 million a year on automobiles, $80 million on liquor, $75 million on wigs and hair pieces, $100 million on playing the numbers. More than 90 per

ADA, OKLA.
NEWS
D 9,845 S 9,987

AUG 11 1963

Our Deepening Crisis

The Threat Of Violence Lies In Negro Struggle

EDITOR'S NOTE — Caught in turmoil of a summer of bitter racial discord, Americans find it difficult at times to assess the dimensions of the crisis, to know what has been gained or lost and where we are heading now. Here, is the last of a special series of Associated Press articles on the integration struggle, is a report by a correspondent who has covered it closely. It sums up the situation to date and looks at changes coming.

By RELMAN MORIN

NEW YORK (AP)—The Negro drive for full equality has reached the dimensions of a national convulsion.

It wracks the whole United States, not just the Southern states. It is breaching the invisible racial barriers of the North no less than the visible walls in the South, shattering the complacency of one region, defeating the slow-down strategy of the other.

"Something's got a-hold of me," the Negro is chanting. "We shall overcome," is his anthem.

His movement is in the streets, the courts, the halls of Congress.

It touches schools and employment practices, a seat at a lunch counter and a home in a better neighborhood, the right to vote and the right to worship in any church, the right to sit in any public park and to read a book in any public library—in short, the rights of an American citizen and access to equal opportunity.

Starting as nonviolent, his campaign has engendered violence. The blood of both races has been spilled. No one can say whether more will flow, or where, or how much.

No Violence

"We will advise our people not to use violence," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, at a news conference in Jackson, Miss. "The Negro can't win in a pitched battle with the whites. He's in the minority."

But can the Negro leaders control their followers, everywhere and at all times? Who, for example, speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

"How can anyone ask me to be nonviolent?" said a Negro war veteran. "That's like putting me back in the line in Korea and loading my rifle with blanks."

Violence begets violence and the possibility of a white counter-reaction has been noted by many as unconstitutional, the doctrine of "separate-but-equal" in public schools. Segregation had been a legal fact for 58 years, based on a decision of the Supreme Court in 1896. Now, the court ordered the schools to be desegregated "with all deliberate speed."

Negroes and their white sympathizers exulted.

But the segregationist, eyeing that phrase, "with all deliberate speed," saw an escape hatch. He determined to resist as long as possible. And he did.

Mob violence exploded in Southern and border states.

A climactic point of this stage was Little Rock, Ark. The year was 1957. Exactly 80 years after the end of the reconstruction in the South, federal troops marched into a Southern city again. They used bayonets to disperse crowds around Central High School. And they escorted Negro children into classrooms.

Elsewhere in the South, however, the barriers remained.

Oxford, Miss., and Tuscaloosa, Ala., were still to come.

At Oxford, two men died and scores were injured when a Negro, James H. Meredith, enrolled in the University of Mississippi. Again, federal troops marched, bivouacing on the campus.

At Tuscaloosa, Gov. George C. Wallace stood in the doorway of a University of Alabama building when Justice Department officials attempted to enroll two Negroes, Vivian Malone and James Hood. A few hours later, he stepped aside when federalized units of the National Guard marched onto the campus. There was no violence.

Long before these incidents, however, the "bright-new-day" jubilance of 1954 had begun to evaporate.

Bitter

Negro disappointment, as the years passed with little desegregation, turned to bitterness. "Gradualism," the policy of slowly ending segregation, and "tokenism," permitting only a handful of Negro children in schools, offices or factories, became fighting words.

Today, nearly 10 years after the Supreme Court decision, figures compiled by the Southern Education Reporting Service indicate that about 257,000 Negro children are attending public elementary and high schools with white students in 17 Southern and border states and the District of Columbia.

Some leaders say this is about to register qualified Negroes. About 50 per cent of these suits have been won.

The Southern Regional Council estimates there are 5,045,000 Negroes of voting age in 11 Southern and border states. About one-fourth, some 1,344,000, are registered.

It is a long, slow process, but the figures for Negro registration are rising, spectacularly in some cases. In Bullock County, Ala., there were four registered Negroes in 1961. Now there are 1,341. This, of course, is a special case.

In all probability, another factor has played a part in the Negro drive for equality, a subtle, unmeasurable factor—the new African nations.

The American Negro has seen African heads of state being received in the White House and getting the red carpet treatment from Soviet Premier Khrushchev and other powerful leaders. He has seen African diplomats speaking from the rostrum of the United Nations.

This has been a source of pride and encouragement.

But it also is a two-edged sword. "An African in a robe and turban can go into a restaurant or a hotel where I can't go," said a Negro public relation man in Washington. "How silly can segregation be? How do you think this makes me feel?"

In South

Then came another catalyst—Birmingham.

Last spring, Negroes there demonstrated in the streets for desegregation of some facilities in downtown stores and the formation of a permanent biracial committee to handle racial problems. So many were arrested that the jails overflowed.

Police dogs and fire hoses were used to disperse the crowds. It was not the first time the dogs had been used in Birmingham. The first time was against white men, rioting around "freedom riders" at a bus station. Nor, of course, was Birmingham the only city to use dogs.

Nevertheless, photographs of dogs leaping toward Negroes went around the globe.

For some reason, Birmingham appears to have dramatized the Negro struggle more than any other incident.

"Birmingham engineered the revolution that began in the spring of 1963," Martin Ochs, editor of the Chattanooga Times, said in a recent speech at the University of Wisconsin.

term. They want the federal government to set aside territory in which they propose to set up a Negro state.

Their leader, Elijah Muhammad lives in Phoenix, Ariz. In answer to the question of whether the Muslims hate white people, he said:

"The Bible teaches us to love good and to hate evil. I can't love him (the white) because his is the very essence of evil."

In the vast, complicated and potentially dangerous picture of the racial struggle today, what are the positive sides? The principal ones would seem to be these:

1. To a greater degree than ever before, the problem is out in the open. More people, especially in the North but in the South, too, are aware of the intricacies and the injustices. More are thinking about it, seeking solutions.

2. Some degree of communication between the races is being restored in the South. Communications, Southerners say, generally tended to break down after the Supreme Court decision on the schools in 1954. Now, fitfully and with difficulty, Negroes and whites in some parts of the South are sitting down together again.

3. President Kennedy, in conferences with scores of Southern businessmen, clergymen and others, has sought means to desegregate many establishment. He set up a presidential committee on equal job opportunity, replacing two other such committees of the Eisenhower administration. It is headed by Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson.

Civil Rights

4. Congress is hearing testimony on the President's package of civil rights legislation. On June 11, he asked Congress to "make a commitment it has not fully made in this century to the proposition that race has no place in American life or law." Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy told the House Judiciary Committee, "This bill before you today embodies that commitment."

5. While the Negroes are crying for rights, a Negro lawyer, Cora T. Walker, is making speeches sharply reminding them of their responsibilities.

She tells them: "We are as much to blame for our present condition as the white majority."

On the political side, she says, "There are approximately one million black people in New York City. These Negroes have no restrictions on their voting rights. Yet there are only two elected the rights of an American citizen and access to equal opportunity.

Starting as nonviolent, his campaign has engendered violence. The blood of both races has been spilled. No one can say whether more will flow, or where, or how much.

No Violence

"We will advise our people not to use violence," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, at a news conference in Jackson, Miss. "The Negro can't win in a pitched battle with the whites. He's in the minority."

But can the Negro leaders control their followers, everywhere and at all times? Who, for example, speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

"How can anyone ask me to be nonviolent?" said a Negro war veteran. "That's like putting me back in the line in Korea and loading my rifle with blanks."

Violence begets violence and the possibility of a white counter-reaction has been noted by many observers. "If that happens," said Hodding Carter, editor of the Greenville, Miss., Delta-Democrat, "all hell will break loose."

During the demonstrations in Birmingham last spring, a white taxi driver said to me, "If they kill any white people, I won't ask any questions. I'll just start killin'."

The hour seems late. Is it one minute to 12 now? If so, what raced the hands of the clock?

The story is soon told.

After World War II, the first important federal government action in race relations came when President Truman ordered the end of segregation in the armed forces. He also asked Congress for strong civil rights legislation. It was not granted.

During President Eisenhower's second administration, Congress enacted civil rights bills in 1957 and 1960. Using these laws, the administration filed 10 suits on behalf of Negroes' voting rights in the South.

History

The historic year, however, in the long and anguished struggle over civil rights, was 1954. The U.S. Supreme Court struck down, attempted to enroll two Negroes, Vivian Malone and James Hood. A few hours later, he stepped aside when federalized units of the National Guard marched onto the campus. There was no violence.

Long before these incidents, however, the "bright-new-day" jubilance of 1954 had begun to evaporate.

Bitter

Negro disappointment, as the years passed with little desegregation, turned to bitterness. "Gradualism," the policy of slowly ending segregation, and "tokenism," permitting only a handful of Negro children in schools, offices or factories, became fighting words.

Today, nearly 10 years after the Supreme Court decision, figures compiled by the Southern Education Reporting Service indicate that about 257,000 Negro children are attending public elementary and high schools with white students in 17 Southern and border states and the District of Columbia.

Negro leaders say this is about 8 per cent of the school-age total.

Apart from the schools, new sectors opened in the fight for civil rights.

In 1955 and 1956, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, headed by the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., boycotted segregated bus lines in Montgomery, Ala. They won.

The boycott, or "selective buying," as the Negro leaders prefer to say, began coming into play as a potent weapon in other parts of the South. Negro economists estimate that the purchasing power of the Negro, nationally, is around $15 billion a year.

"Selective buying" has put Southern businessmen in a vise. If thy integrate some facilities after a Negro boycott, they may be hit by a white boycott.

Along with the boycott came the "sit-in," the tactic of simply sitting quietly in a restaurant, seeking service. Or the "kneel-in," crowds of Negroes praying on the steps of a public building or in a main street, stopping traffic.

CORE

These maneuvers were pioneered by the Congress of Racial Equality, which was founded in 1942 at the University of Chicago. It obtained a foothold in the South with the sit-ins of 1960.

Parallel with action on these fronts, the Negroes began concentrating their efforts in another supremely important field — voter registration. Another Negro organization, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee — "SNICK"—has been active in this work.

The Justice Department has assisted. Since 1961, it has filed 29 suits against officials for refusing

Then came another catalyst — Birmingham.

Last spring, Negroes there demonstrated in the streets for desegregation of some facilities in downtown stores and the formation of a permanent biracial committee to handle racial problems. So many were arrested that the jails overflowed.

Police dogs and fire hoses were used to disperse the crowds. It was not the first time the dogs had been used in Birmingham. The first time was against white men, rioting around "freedom riders" at a bus station. Nor, of course, was Birmingham the only city to use dogs.

Nevertheless, photographs of dogs leaping toward Negroes went around the globe.

For some reason, Birmingham appears to have dramatized the Negro struggle more than any other incident.

"Birmingham engineered the revolution that began in the spring of 1963," Martin Ochs, editor of the Chattanooga Times, said in a recent speech at the University of Wisconsin.

Fear of violence and economic trouble has fostered a "mood of reconciliation" toward racial integration in the south, Ochs said.

Demonstrations

Almost overnight after Birmingham, too, Negro demonstrations erupted in the North. Violence flared in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and other Northern cities. The Los Angeles Times published a cartoon depicting two Negro figures, one in a menacing posture. It was captioned, "Integration, not intimidation."

In the North, Negro demands focus mainly on jobs and housing. Negro unemployment is high, more than double white unemployment. Labor unions have ben accused of discriminating against Negroes. Negro leaders are demanding that a certain quota of Negroes shall be employed on given projects, and even in restaurants.

In New York City, to dramatize these and other demands, Negroes entered the offices of Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller and stayed for days in a sit-in. They staged another in the City Hall.

Another recent development has been a unifying move among seven Negro organizations, some of which had been sniping at each other. They were the NAACP, CORE, SCLC, "SNICK," the National Urban League, the National Council of Negro Women, and the Legal Defense and Education Fun of the NAACP, a separately incorporated organization.

The coalition takes the name Council for United Civil Rights Leadership.

"Our primary concern is to eliminate violence," a spokesman said. "We want to provide a cadre of experienced Negro leaders who job opportunity, replacing two other such committees of the Eisenhower administration. It is headed by Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson.

Civil Rights

4. Congress is hearing testimony on the President's package of civil rights legislation. On June 11, he asked Congress to "make a commitment it has not fully made in this century to the proposition that race has no place in American life or law." Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy told the House Judiciary Committee, "This bill before you today embodies that commitment."

5. While the Negroes are crying for rights, a Negro lawyer, Cora T. Walker, is making speeches sharply reminding them of their responsibilities.

She tells them: "We are as much to blame for our present condition as the white majority."

On the political side, she says, "There are approximately one million black people in New York City. These Negroes have no restrictions on their voting rights. Yet there are only two elected Negroes in the entire city legislative government."

Of the economic situation, Mrs. Walker says, "In Harlem alone, Negroes spend $150 million a year on automobiles, $80 million on liquor, $75 million on wigs and hair pieces, $100 million on playing the numbers. More than 90 per cent of the businesses in our ghettos are owned, controlled and managed by whites outside of the community. We give minimum support to our own, who are in businesses or professions."

Grim Facts

Of some social facts, she says, "We now are the major statistic in juvenile delinquency, dope addiction, crime, and school dropouts. Is this why 75 per cent of the out-of-wedlock children are born of our race?"

Mrs. Walker suggests that Negroes should do more to help each other. "Isn't it our responsibility," she asks, "to take the initiative to secure the needs of our underprivileged?"

A similar position was taken recently by another minority group, the Nisei, or American-born Japanese. In San Francisco, Howard Imazeki, editor of the newspaper, Hobukei Mainichi, said in an editorial:

"We have yet to hear any Negro voices blaming themselves for their social maladjustment.

"What we are trying to say most sincerely here is that the Negro leaders should do a little soul-searching of their own."

Nearly 72 years ago, on Aug. 19, 1891, the New York Mail & Express published a pathetic little item. It said some Negro clergymen had met to discuss means of obtaining "better opportunities" for their people.

DURHAM, N.C.
HERALD
D. 35,032 S. 41,626

AUG 1 1 1963

'We Shall Overcome' Rin
As Negroes' Anthem In T

Editor's Note — Caught in turmoil of a summer of bitter racial discord, Americans find it difficult at times to assess the dimensions of the crisis, to know what has been gained or lost and where we are heading now. Here is the last of a special series of Associated Press articles on the integration struggle, a report by a correspondent who has covered it closely. It sums up the situation to date and looks at changes coming.

By RELMAN MORIN

NEW YORK (AP) — The Negro drive for full equality has reached the dimensions of a national convulsion.

It wracks the whole United States, not just the Southern states. It is breaching the invisible racial barriers of the North no less than the visible walls in the South, shattering the complacency of one region, defeating the slow-down strategy of the other.

"Something's got a-hold of me," the Negro is chanting. "We shall overcome," is his anthem.

His movement is in the streets, the courts, the halls of Congress.

It touches schools and employment practices, a seat at a lunch counter and a home in a better neighborhood, the right to vote and the right to worship in any church, the right to sit in any public park and to read a book in any public library—in short, the rights of an American citizen and access to equal opportunity.

Starting as nonviolent, his campaign has engendered violence. The blood of both races has been spilled. No one can say whether more will flow, or where, or how much.

"We will advise our people not to use violence," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, at a news conference in Jackson, Miss. "The Negro can't win in a pitched battle with the whites. He's in the minority."

But can the Negro leaders control their followers, everywhere and at all times? Who, for example, speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

"How can anyone ask me to be nonviolent?" said a Negro war veteran. "That's like putting me back in the line in Korea and loading my rifle with blanks."

Violence begets violence and the possibility of a white counter-reaction has been noted by many observers. "If that happens," said Hodding Carter, editor of the Greenville, Miss., Delta-Democrat, "all hell will break loose."

During the demonstrations in Birmingham last spring, a white taxi driver said to me, "If they kill any white people, I won't ask any questions. I'll just start killin'."

The hour seems late. Is it one minute to 12 now? If so, what raced the hands of the clock?

The story is soon told.

After World War II, the first important federal government action in race relations came when President Truman ordered the end of segregation in the armed forces. He also asked Congress for strong civil rights legislation. It was not granted.

During President Eisenhower's second administration, Congress enacted civil rights bills in 1957 and 1960. Using these laws, the administration filed 10 suits on behalf of Negroes' voting rights in the South.

The historic year, however, in the long and anguished struggle over civil rights, was 1954. The U.S. Supreme Court struck down, as unconstitutional, the doctrine of "separate - but-equal" in public schools. Segregation had been a legal fact for 58 years, based on a decision of the Supreme Court in 1896. Now, the court ordered the schools to be desegregated "with all deliberate speed."

Negroes and their white sympathizers exulted.

But the segregationist, eyeing that phrase, "with all deliberate speed," saw an escape hatch. He determined to resist as long as possible. And he did.

Mob violence exploded in Southern and border states.

A climactic point of this stage was Little Rock, Ark. The year was 1957. Exactly 80 years after the end of the reconstruction in the South, federal troops marched into a Southern city again. They used bayonets to disperse crowds around Central High School. And they escorted Negro children into classrooms.

Elsewhere in the South, however, the barriers remained.

Oxford, Miss., and Tuscaloosa, Ala., were still to come.

At Oxford, two men died and scores were injured when a Negro, James H. Meredith, enrolled in the University of Mississippi. Again, federal troops marched, bivouacing on the campus.

At Tuscaloosa, Gov. George C. Wallace stood in the doorway of a University of Alabama building when Justice Department officials attempted to enroll two Negroes, Vivian Maline and James Hood. A few hours later, he stepped aside when federalized units of the National Guard marched onto the campus. There was no violence.

Long before these incidents, however, the "bright-new-day" jubilance of 1954 had begun to evaporate.

Negro disappointment, as the years passed with little desegregation, turned to bitterness. "Gradualism," the policy of slowly ending segregation, and "tokenism," permitting only a handful of Negro children in schools, offices or factories, became fighting words.

Today, nearly 10 years after the Supreme Court decision, figures compiled by the Southern Education Reporting Service indicate that about 257,000 Negro children are attending public elementary and high schools with white students in 17 Southern and border states and the District of Columbia.

Negro leaders say this is about 8 per cent of the school-age total.

Apart from the schools, new sectors opened in the fight for civil rights.

In 1955 and 1956, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, headed by Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., boycotted segregated bus lines in Montgomery, Ala. They won.

The boycott, or "selective buying," as the Negro leaders prefer to say, began coming into play as a potent weapon in other parts of the South. Negro economists estimate that the purchasing power of the Negrow, nationally, is around $15 billion a year.

"Selective buying" has put Southern businessmen in a vise. If they integrate some facilities after a Negro boycott, they may be hit by a white boycott.

Along with the boycott came the "sit-in," the tactic of simply sitting quietly in a restaurant, seeking service. Or the "kneel-in," crowds of Negroes praying on the steps of a public building or in a main street, stopping traffic.

These maneuvers were pioneered by the Congress of Racial Equality, which was founded in 1942 at the University of Chicago. It obtained a foothold in the South with the sit-ins of 1960.

Parallel with action on these fronts, the Negroes began concentrating their efforts in another supremely important field—voter registration. Another Negro organization, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee—"SNICK"—has been active in this work.

Negro Gets A Break

A Negro shares a work break with white workers on a construction job in New York. Picket lines in the North, in the current upsurge of Negro militancy, often are keyed to the demand for jobs, and for better jobs. A union official points out that unions cannot afford to lower job standards by putting unqualified men in skilled work. So, say the Negroes, give us the skills.

Rings Out In Turmoil

: unions cannot ndards by put-n skilled work.
, give us the n the schools, new ed in the fight for 1956, the Southern eadership Confer-

by Rev. Dr. Mar-King Jr., boycotted bus lines in Mont-
. They won.

ott, or "selective the Negro leaders
y, began coming a potent weapon in of the South. Negro estimate that the ower of the Ne-ally, is around $15
r.

buying" has put inessmen in a vise.
rate some facilities boycott, they may white boycott.

the boycott came the tactic of sim-uietly in a restau-service. Or the rowds of Negroes
e steps of a public in a main street,
lic.

euvers were pio-e Congress of Ra-which was found-the University of btained a foothold with the sit-ins of h action on these egroes began con-ir efforts in anoth-important field—

ation. Another Ne-tion, the Student
Coordinating Com-CK"—has been acork.

The Justice Department has assisted. Since 1961, it has filed 29 suits against officials for refusing to register qualified Negroes. About 50 per cent of these suits have been won.

The Southern Regional Council estimates there are 5,045,000 Negroes of voting age in 11 Southern and border states. About one-fourth, some 1,344,000 are registered.

Many tactics have been used to discourage Negroes from registering — gerrymandering, intimidation, widely - spaced meetings of registration boards, throwing out Negro applications on technicalities.

So concerted voter-registration drives began. Students went through Negro communities, ringing doorbells. Officials stationed themselves in public buildings in the South, buttonholing every Negro who came in, whatever his business, and urging him to register, there and then. Voter "clinics" were set up to instruct Negroes in filling out the application forms, and in meeting the technicalities.

It is a long, slow process, but the figures for Negro registration are rising, spectacularly in some cases. In Bullock County, Ala., there were four registered Negroes in 1961. Now there are 1,341. This, of course, is a special case.

Of the registration drives, Bishop George W. Barber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible Negro voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

In all probability, another factor has played a part in the Negro drive for equality, a subtle, unmeasurable factor — the new African nations.

The American Negro has seen African heads of state being received in the White House and getting the red carpet treatment from Soviet Premier Khrushchev and other powerful leaders. He has seen African diplomats speaking from the rostrum of the United Nations.

This has been a source of pride and encouragement.

But it also is a two-edged sword.

"An African in a robe and turban can go into a restaurant or a hotel where I can't go," said a Negro public relations man in Washington. "How silly can segregation be? How do you think this makes me feel?"

Then came another catalyst—Birmingham.

Last spring, Negroes there demonstrated in the streets for desegregation of some facilities in downtown stores and the formation of a permanent biracial committee to handle racial problems. So many were arrested that the jails overflowed.

Police dogs and fire hoses were used to disperse the crowds. It was not the first time the dogs had been used in Birmingham. The first time was against white men, rioting around "freedom riders" at a bus station. Nor, of course, was Birmingham the only city to use dogs.

Nevertheless, photographs of dogs leaping toward Negroes went around the globe.

For some reason, Birmingham appears to have dramatized the Negro struggle more than any other incident.

"Birmingham engineered the revolution that began in the spring of 1963," Martin Ochs, editor of the Chattanooga Times, said in a recent speech at the University of Wisconsin.

Fear of violence and economic trouble has fostered a "mood of reconciliation" toward racial integration in the South, Ochs said.

Almost overnight after Birmingham, too, Negro demonstrations erupted in the North. Violence flared in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and other Northern cities. The Los Angeles Times published a cartoon depicting two Negro figures, one in a menacing posture. It was captioned, "Integration, not intimidation."

In the North, Negro demands focus mainly on jobs and housing. Negro unemployment is high, more than double white unemployment. Labor unions have been accused of discriminating against Negroes. Negro leaders are demanding that a certain quota of Negroes shall be employed on given projects, and even in restaurants.

In New York City, to dramatize these and other demands, Negroes entered the offices of Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller and stayed for days in a sit-in. They staged another in the City Hall.

Another recent development has been a unifying move among seven Negro organizations, some of which had been sniping at each other. They were the NAACP, CORE, SCLC, "SNICK," the National Urban League, the National Council of Negro Women, and the Legal Defense and Education Fund of the NAACP, a separately incorporated organization.

The coalition takes the name Council for United Civil Rights Leadership.

"Our primary concern is to eliminate violence," a spokesman said. "We want to provide a cadre of experienced Negro leaders who will prevent things from getting out of hand and keep irresponsible elements from turning to violence."

Distinctly separate from these groups are the Black Muslims. They demand, not integration, but total segregation on their own terms. They want the federal government to set aside territory in which they propose to set up a Negro state.

Their leader, Muhammad Elijah, lives in Phoenix, Ariz. In answer to the question of whether the Muslims hate white people, he said:

"The Bible teaches us to love good and to hate evil. I can't love him (the white) because his is the very essence of evil."

In the vast, complicated and potentially dangerous picture of the racial struggle today, what are the positive sides?

Bloody Climax

A National Guardsman, one of three injured by a single shot fired into their car, is aided by a state policeman in Cambridge, Md. Growing militancy, and finally violence, interrupted a pattern of partial integration in the town on the Eastern Shore of Maryland. Efforts to settle Cambride's crisis are stalemated. But other Eastern Shore towns, observing Cambridge's growing tensions, have integrated without incident.

Start Of Chain Reaction

In the North as in the South, most Negroes live in ghettoes. These tenements are in the largest, New York's Harlem. The restricted housing in turn leads to de facto school segregation, say Northern Negroes, demanding admission to white schools which they maintain are better. This demand in turn is tied to the need for better education to equip Negroes with the skills they must have to improve their job status. (AP Newsfeatures Photos)

LAS VEGAS, NEV.
REVIEW-JOURNAL
D: 31,223 S. 31,825

AUG 11 1963

World Waits and Wat

EDITORS NOTE — Caught in the turmoil of a summer of bitter racial discord, Americans find it difficult at times to assess the dimensions of the crisis, to know what has been gained or lost and where we are heading now. Here, in the last of a special series of Associated Press articles on the integration struggle, is a report by a correspondent who has covered it closely. It sums up the situation to date and looks at changes coming.

By RELMAN MORIN

NEW YORK (AP)—The Negro drive for full equality has reached the dimensions of a national convulsion.

It wracks the whole United States, not just the Southern states. It is breaching the invisible racial barriers of the North no less than the visible walls in the South, shattering the complacency of one region, defeating the slow-down strategy of the other.

"Something's got a-hold of me," the Negro is chanting. "We shall overcome," is his anthem.

His movement is in the streets, the courts, the halls of Congress.

It touches schools and employment practices, a seat at a lunch counter and a home in a better neighborhood, the right to vote and the right to worship in any church, the right to sit in any public park and to read a book in any public library—in short, the rights of an American citizen and access to equal opportunity.

Starting as nonviolent, his campaign has engendered violence. The blood of both races has been spilled. No one can say whether more will flow, or where, or how much.

"We will advise our people not to use violence," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, at a news conference in Jackson, Miss. "The Negro can't win in a pitched battle with the whites. He's in the minority."

But can the Negro leaders control their followers, everywhere and at all times? Who, for example, speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

"How can anyone ask me to be nonviolent?" said a Negro war veteran. "That's like putting me back in the line in Korea and loading my rifle with blanks."

Violence begets violence and the possibility of a white counter-reaction has been noted by many observers. "If that happens," said Hodding Carter, editor of the Greenville, Miss., Delta-Democrat, "all hell will break loose."

During the demonstrations in Birmingham last spring, a white taxi driver said to me, "If they kill any white people, I won't ask any questions. I'll just start killin'."

The hour seems late. Is it one minute to 12 now? If so, what raced the hands of the clock?

The story is soon told.

After World War II, the first important federal government action in race relations came when President Truman ordered the end of segregation in the armed forces. He also asked Congress for strong civil rights legislation. It was not granted.

AT BAY — Racial conflict in the United States such as is pictured here in the Birmingham, Ala., outbreak recently draws wide attention abroad. Officials agree American prestige is tarnished to some measure by racial conflict.
AP WIREPHOTO

During President Eisenhower's second administration, Congress enacted civil rights bills in 1957 and 1960. Using these laws, the administration filed 10 suits on behalf of Negroes' voting rights in the South.

The historic year, however, in the long and anguished struggle over civil rights, was 1954. The U.S. Supreme Court struck down, as unconstitutional, the doctrine of "separate-but-equal" in public schools. Segregation had been a legal fact for 58 years, based on a decision of the Supreme Court in 1896. Now, the court-ordered the schools to be desegregated "with all deliberate speed."

Negroes and their white sympathizers exulted.

But the segregationist, eying that phrase, "with all deliberate speed," saw an escape hatch. He determined to resist as long as possible. And he did.

Mob violence exploded in Southern and border states.

A climactic point of this stage was Little Rock, Ark. The year was 1957. Exactly 80 years after the end of the reconstruction in the South, federal troops marched into a Southern city again. They used bayonets to disperse crowds around Central High School. And they escorted Negro children into classrooms.

Elsewhere in the South, however, the barriers remained.

Oxford, Miss., and Tuscaloosa, Ala., were still to come.

At Oxford, two men died and scores were injured when a Negro, James H. Meredith, enrolled in the University of Mississippi. Again, federal troops marched, bivouacking on the campus.

At Tuscaloosa, Gov. George C. Wallace stood in the doorway of a University of Alabama building when Justice Department officials attempted to enroll two Negroes, Vivian Maline and James Hood. A few hours later, he stepped aside when federalized units of ly ending segregation, and "tokenism," permitting only a handful of Negro children in schools, offices or factories, became fighting words.

Today, nearly 10 years after the Supreme Court decision, figures compiled by the Southern Education Reporting Service indicate that about 257,000 Negro children are attending public elementary and high schools with white students in 17 Southern and border states and the District of Columbia.

Negro leaders say this is about 8 per cent of the school-age total.

Apart from the schools, new sectors opened in the fight for civil rights.

In 1955 and 1956, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, headed by the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., boycotted segregated bus lines in Montgomery, Ala. They won.

The boycott, or "selective buying," as the Negro leaders prefer to say, began coming into play as a potent weapon in other parts of the South. Negro economists estimate that the purchasing power of the Negro, nationally, is around $15 billion a year.

"Selective buying" has put Southern businessmen in a vise. If they integrate some facilities after a Negro boycott, they may be hit by a white boycott.

Along with the boycott came the "sit-in," the tactic of simply sitting quietly in a restaurant, seeing service. Or the "kneel-in," crowds of Negroes praying on the steps of a public building or in a main street, stopping traffic.

These maneuvers were pioneered by the Congress of Racial Equality, which was founded in 1942 at the University of Chicago. It obtained a foothold in the South with the sit-ins of 1960.

Parallel with action on these fronts, the Negroes began concentrating their efforts in another supremely important field —voter

The Southern Regional Council estimates there are 5,045,000 Negroes of voting age in 11 Southern and border states. About one-fourth, some 1,344,000, are registered.

Many tactics have been used to discourage Negroes from registering — gerrymandering, intimidation, widely-spaced meetings of registration boards, throwing out

Watches U.S. Race Crisis

ictured here in the abroad. Officials racial conflict.
AP WIREPHOTO

outhern Regional Council es there are 5,045,000 Ne- f voting age in 11 Southern rder states. About one- some 1,344,000, are regis-tactics have been used to age Negroes from register- gerrymandering, intimida- idely-spaced meetings of ation boards, throwing out Negro applications on technicalities.

So concerted voter-registration drives began. Students went through Negro communities, ringing doorbells. Officials stationed themselves in public buildings in the South, buttonholing every Negro who came in, whatever his business, and urging him to register, there and then. Voter "clinics" were set up to instruct Negroes in filling out the application forms, and in meeting the technicalities.

It is a long, slow process, but the figures for Negro registration are rising, spectacularly in some cases. In Bullock County, Alabama, there were four registered Negroes in 1961. Now there are 1,341. This, of course, is a special case.

Of the registration drives, Bishop George W. Barber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible Negro voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

In all probability, another factor has played a part in the Negro drive for equality, a subtle, unmeasurable factor—the new African nations.

The American Negro has seen African heads of state being received in the White House and getting the red carpet treatment from Soviet Premier Khrushchev and other powerful leaders. He has seen African diplomats speaking from the rostrum of the United Nations.

This has been a source of pride and encouragement.

But it also is a two-edged sword "An African in a robe and turban can go into a restaurant or a hotel where I can't go," said a Negro public relations man in Washington. "How silly can segregation be? How do you think this makes me feel?"

Then came another catalyst—Birmingham.

Last spring, Negroes there demonstrated in the streets for desegregation of some facilities in downtown stores and the formation of a permanent biracial committee to handle racial problems. So many were arrested that the jails overflowed.

Police dogs and fire hoses were used to disperse the crowds. It was not the first time the dogs had been used in Birmingham. The first time was against white men, rioting around "freedom riders" at a bus station. Nor, of course, was Birmingham the only city to use dogs.

Nevertheless, photographs of dogs leaping toward Negroes went around the globe.

"For some reason, Birmingham appears to have dramatized the Negro struggle more than any revolution that began in the spring of 1963," Martin Ochs, editor of the Chattanooga Times, said in a recent speech at the University of Wisconsin.

Fear of violence and economic trouble has fostered a "mood of reconciliation" toward racial integration in the south, Ochs said.

Almost overnight after Birmingham, too, Negro demonstrations erupted in the North. Violence flared in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and other Northern cities. The Los Angeles Times published a cartoon depicting two Negro figures, one in a menacing posture. It was captioned, "Integration, not intimidation."

In the North, Negro demands focus mainly on jobs and housing. Negro unemployment is high, more than double white unemployment. Labor unions have been accused of discriminating against Negroes. Negro leaders are demanding that a certain quota of Negroes shall be employed on given projects, and even in restaurants.

In New York City, to dramatize these and other demands, Negroes entered the offices of Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller and stayed for days in a sit-in. They staged another in the City Hall.

Another recent development has been a unifying move among seven Negro organizations, some of which had been sniping at each other. They were the NAACP, CORE, SCLC, "SNICK," the National Urban League, the National Council of Negro Women, and the Legal Defense and Education Fund of the NAACP, a separately incorporated organization.

The coalition takes the name Council for United Civil Rights Leadership.

"Our primary concern is to eliminate violence," a spokesman said. "We want to provide a cadre of experienced Negro leaders who will prevent things from getting out of hand and keep irresponsible elements from turning to violence."

Distinctly separate from these groups are the Black Muslims. They demand, not integration, but total segregation on their own terms. They want the federal government to set aside territory in which they propose to set up a Negro state.

Their leader, Muhammad Elijah, lives in Phoenix, Ariz. In answer to the question of whether the Muslims hate white people, he said:

"The Bible teaches us to love good and to hate evil. I can't love him (the white) because his is the very essence of evil."

In the vast, complicated and potentially dangerous picture of the racial struggle today, what are the positive sides?

vulsion.

It wracks the whole United States, not just the Southern states. It is breaching the invisible racial barriers of the North no less than the visible walls in the South, shattering the complacency of one region, defeating the slow-down strategy of the other.

"Something's got a-hold of me," the Negro is chanting. "We shall overcome," is his anthem.

His movement is in the streets, the courts, the halls of Congress. It touches schools and employment practices, a seat at a lunch counter and a home in a better neighborhood, the right to vote and the right to worship in any church, the right to sit in any public park and to read a book in any public library—in short, the rights of an American citizen and access to equal opportunity.

Starting as nonviolent, his campaign has engendered violence. The blood of both races has been spilled. No one can say whether more will flow, or where, or how much.

"We will advise our people not to use violence," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, at a news conference in Jackson, Miss. "The Negro can't win in a pitched battle with the whites. He's in the minority."

But can the Negro leaders control their followers, everywhere and at all times? Who, for example, speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

"How can anyone ask me to be nonviolent?" said a Negro war veteran. "That's like putting me back in the line in Korea and loading my rifle with blanks."

Violence begets violence and the possibility of a white counter-reaction has been noted by many observers. "If that happens," said Hodding Carter, editor of the Greenville, Miss., Delta-Democrat, "all hell will break loose."

During the demonstrations in Birmingham last spring, a white taxi driver said to me, "If they kill any white people, I won't ask any questions. I'll just start killin'."

The hour seems late. Is it one minute to 12 now? If so, what raced the hands of the clock?

The story is soon told.

After World War II, the first important federal government action in race relations came when President Truman ordered the end of segregation in the armed forces. He also asked Congress for strong civil rights legislation. It was not granted.

AT BAY — Racial conflict in the United States such as is pictured here in the Birmingham, Ala., outbreak recently draws wide attention abroad. Officials agree American prestige is tarnished to some measure by racial conflict.
AP WIREPHOTO

During President Eisenhower's second administration, Congress enacted civil rights bills in 1957 and 1960. Using these laws, the administration filed 10 suits on behalf of Negroes' voting rights in the South.

The historic year, however, in the long and anguished struggle over civil rights, was 1954. The U.S. Supreme Court struck down, as unconstitutional, the doctrine of "separate-but-equal" in public schools. Segregation had been a legal fact for 58 years, based on a decision of the Supreme Court in 1896. Now, the court-ordered the schools to be desegregated "with all deliberate speed."

Negroes and their white sympathizers exulted.

But the segregationist, eying that phrase, "with all deliberate speed," saw an escape hatch. He determined to resist as long as possible. And he did.

Mob violence exploded in Southern and border states.

A climactic point of this stage was Little Rock, Ark. The year was 1957. Exactly 80 years after the end of the reconstruction in the South, federal troops marched into a Southern city again. They used bayonets to disperse crowds around Central High School. And they escorted Negro children into classrooms.

Elsewhere in the South, however, the barriers remained.

Oxford, Miss., and Tuscaloosa, Ala., were still to come.

At Oxford, two men died and scores were injured when a Negro, James H. Meredith, enrolled in the University of Mississippi. Again, federal troops marched, bivouacking on the campus.

At Tuscaloosa, Gov. George C. Wallace stood in the doorway of a University of Alabama building when Justice Department officials attempted to enroll two Negroes, Vivian Maline and James Hood. A few hours later, he stepped aside when federalized units of the National Guard marched onto the campus. There was no violence.

Long before these incidents, however, the "bright-new-day" jubilance of 1954 had begun to evaporate.

Negro disappointment, as the years passed with little desegregation, turned to bitterness. "Gradualism," the policy of slowly ending segregation, and "tokenism," permitting only a handful of Negro children in schools, offices or factories, became fighting words.

Today, nearly 10 years after the Supreme Court decision, figures compiled by the Southern Education Reporting Service indicate that about 257,000 Negro children are attending public elementary and high schools with white students in 17 Southern and border states and the District of Columbia.

Negro leaders say this is about 8 per cent of the school-age total.

Apart from the schools, new sectors opened in the fight for civil rights.

In 1955 and 1956, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, headed by the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., boycotted segregated bus lines in Montgomery, Ala. They won.

The boycott, or "selective buying," as the Negro leaders prefer to say, began coming into play as a potent weapon in other parts of the South. Negro economists estimate that the purchasing power of the Negro, nationally, is around $15 billion a year.

"Selective buying" has put Southern businessmen in a vise. If they integrate some facilities after a Negro boycott, they may be hit by a white boycott.

Along with the boycott came the "sit-in," the tactic of simply sitting quietly in a restaurant, seeing service. Or the "kneel-in," crowds of Negroes praying on the steps of a public building or in a main street, stopping traffic.

These maneuvers were pioneered by the Congress of Racial Equality, which was founded in 1942 at the University of Chicago. It obtained a foothold in the South with the sit-ins of 1960.

Parallel with action on these fronts, the Negroes began concentrating their efforts in another supremely important field —voter registration. Another Negro organization, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee — "SNICK"—has been active in this work.

The Justice Department has assisted. Since 1961, it has filed 29 suits against officials for refusing to register qualified Negroes. About 50 per cent of these suits have been won.

The Southern Regional Council estimates there are 5,045,000 Negroes of voting age in 11 Southern and border states. About one-fourth, some 1,344,000, are registered.

Many tactics have been used to discourage Negroes from registering — gerrymandering, intimidation, widely-spaced meetings of registration boards, throwing out

APPLETON, WIS.
POST-CRESCENT
D. 33,946 S. 33,291

AUG 11 1963

Turmoil in Negro Crisis Gives Point to Question of Future

BY RELMAN MORIN

NEW YORK (AP) — The Negro drive for full equality has reached the dimensions of a national convulsion.

It wracks the whole United States, not just the southern states. It is breaching the invisible racial barriers of the North no less than the visible walls in the South, shattering the complacency of one region, defeating the slow-down strategy of the other.

"Something's got a-hold of me," the Negro is chanting. "We shall overcome," is his anthem.

His movement is in the streets, the courts, the halls of Congress.

It touches schools and employment practices, a seat at a lunch counter and a home in a better neighborhood, the right to vote and the right to worship in any church, the right to sit in any public park and to read a book in any public library — in short, the rights of an American citizen and access to equal opportunity.

Starting as non-violent, his campaign has engendered violence. The blood of both races has been spilled. No one can say whether more will flow, or where, or how much.

"We will advise our people not to use violence," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), at a news conference in Jackson, Miss. "The Negro can't win in a pitched battle with the whites. He's in the minority."

But can the Negro leaders control their followers, everywhere and at all times? Who, for example, speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

"How can anyone ask me to be non-violent?" said a Negro war veteran. "That's like putting me back in the line in Korea and loading my rifle with blanks."

Counter-Reaction

Violence begets violence and the possibility of a white counter-reaction has been noted by many observers. "If that happens," said Hodding Carter, editor of the Greenville, Miss., Delta-Democrat, "all hell will break loose."

During the demonstrations in Birmingham last spring, a white taxi driver said to me, "If they kill any white people, I won't ask questions. I'll just start killin'."

The hour seems late. Is it one minute to 12 now? If so, what the court ordered the schools to be desegregated "with all deliberate speed."

Negroes and their white sympathizers exulted.

But the segregationist, eying that phrase, "with all deliberate speed," saw an escape hatch. He determined to resist as long as possible. And he did.

Mob violence exploded in southern and border states.

A climactic point of this stage was Little Rock, Ark. The year was 1957. Exactly 80 years after the end of the Reconstruction in the South, federal troops marched into a southern city again. They used bayonets to disperse crowds around Central High School. And they escorted Negro children into classrooms.

Elsewhere in the South, however, the barriers remained.

Oxford, Miss., and Tuscaloosa, Ala., were still to come.

Oxford Riot

At Oxford, two men died and scores were injured when a Negro, James H. Meredith, enrolled in the University of Mississippi. Again, federal troops marched, bivouacing on the campus.

At Tuscaloosa, Gov. George C. Wallace stood in the doorway of a University of Alabama building when Justice Department officials attempted to enroll two Negroes, Vivian Malone and James Hood. A few hours later, he stepped aside when federalized units of the National Guard marched onto the campus. There was no violence.

Long before these incidents, however, the "bright-new-day" jubilance of 1954 had begun to evaporate.

Negro disappointment, as the years passed with little desegregation, turned to bitterness. "Gradualism," the policy of slowly ending segregation, and "tokenism," permitting only a handful of Negro children in schools, offices or factories, became fighting words.

8 Per Cent

Today, nearly 10 years after the Supreme Court decision, figures compiled by the Southern Education Reporting Service indicate that about 257,000 Negro children are attending public elementary and high schools with white students in 17 southern and border states and the District of Columbia.

Negro leaders say this is about eight per cent of the school-age total.

Apart from the schools, new

These maneuvers were pioneered by the Committee on Racial Equality (CORE) which was founded in 1942 at the University of Chicago. It obtained a foothold in the South with the "sit-in" of 1960.

Registration

Parallel with action on these fronts, the Negroes began concentrating their efforts in another supremely important field — voter registration. Another Negro organization, the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee ("SNICK") has been active in this work.

The Justice Department has assisted. Since 1961, it has filed 29 suits against officials for refusing to register qualified Negroes. About 50 per cent of these suits have been won.

The Southern Regional Council estimates there are 5,045,000 Negroes of voting age in 11 southern and border states. About one fourth, some 1,344,000, are registered.

Many tactics have been used to discourage Negroes from registering — genrymandering, intimidation, widely-spaced meetings of registration boards, throwing out Negro applications on technicalities.

So concerted voter-registration drives began. Students went through Negro communitites, ringing doorbells. Officials stationed themselves in public buildings in the South, buttonholing every Negro who came in, whatever his business, and urging him to register, there and then. Voter "clinics" were set up to instruct Negroes in filling out the application forms, and in meeting the technicalities.

It is a long, slow process, but the figures for Negro registration are rising, spectacularly in some cases. In Bullock County, Ala., there were four registered Negroes in 1961. Now there are 1,341. This, of course, is a special case.

Of the registration drives, Bishop George W. Barber, of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible Negro voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

In all probability, another factor has played a part in the Negro drive for equality, a subtle, unmeasurable factor — the new African nations.

Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. speaks to an overflow crowd at the Holt St. Baptist Church in Montgomery, Ala., March 22, 1956, urging a boycott of the city's segregated buses. (AP Newsfeatures Photo) committee to handle racial problems. So many were arrested that the jails overflowed.

Police dogs and fire hoses were used to disperse the crowds. It was not the first time the dogs had been used in Birmingham. The first time was against white men, rioting around "Freedom Riders" at a bus station. Nor, of course, was Birmingham the only city to use dogs.

Nevertheless, photographs of dogs leaping toward Negroes went around the globe.

For some reason, Birmingham appears to have dramatized the Negro struggle more than any other incident.

"Birmingham engineered the revolution that began in the spring of 1963," Martin Ochs, editor of the Chattanooga Times, said in a recent speech at the University of Wisconsin.

Fear of violence and economic trouble has fostered a "mood of reconciliation" toward racial integration in the South, Ochs said.

Almost overnight after Birmingham, too, Negro demonstrations erupted in the North. Violence flared in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and other northern cities. The Los Angeles Times published a cartoon depicting two Negro figures, one in a menacing posture. It was captioned, "integration not ingood and hate evil. I can't love him (the white) because his is the very essence of evil."

In the vast, complicated and potentially dangerous picture of the racial struggle today, what are the positive sides? The principal ones would seem to be these:

1. To a greater degree than ever before, the problem is out in the open. More people, especially in the North but in the South, too, are aware of the intricacies and the injustices. More are thinking about it, seeking solutions.

2. Some degree of communication between the races is being restored in the South. Communications, southerners say, generally tended to break down after the Supreme Court decision on the schools in 1954. Now, fitfully and with difficulty, Negroes and whites in some parts of the South are sitting down together again. One southern newspaper publisher called such a meeting in his own plant — and deliberately placed the conference table where it could be seen through from the sidewalk.

3. President Kennedy, in conferences with scores of southern businessmen, clergymen and others, has sought means to desegregate many establishments. He set up a presidential committee on equal job opportunity, replacing two other such committees of the Eisenhower administration. It is headed by Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson.

4. Congress is hearing testimony on the President's package of civil rights legislation. On June 11, he asked Congress to "make a commitment it has not fully made in this century to the proposition that race has no place in American life or law." Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy told the House Judiciary Committee, "This bill before you today embodies that commitment."

5. While the Negroes are crying for rights, a Negro lawyer, Mrs. Cora T. Walker, is making speeches sharply reminding them of their responsibilities. She tells them:

"We are as much to blame for our present condition as the white majority."

On the political side, she says, "There are approximately one million black people in New York City. These Negroes have no restrictions on their voting rights. Yet there are only two elected Negroes in the entire city legislative government."

Negro Critic

Of the economic situation, Mrs. Walker says, "In Harlem alone, Negroes spend $150 million a year on automobiles; $80 million on liquor, $75 million on wigs and hair pieces, $100 million on playing the numbers. More than 90 per cent of the businesses in our ghettos are owned, controlled and managed by whites outside of the community. We give minimum support to our own, who are in businesses or professions."

Of some social facts, she says, "We now are the major statistic in juvenile delinquency, dope addiction, crime, and school drop-outs. Is this why 75 per cent of the out-of-wedlock children are born of our race?"

Mrs. Walker suggests that Negroes should do more to help each other. "Isn't it our responsibility," she asks, "to take the initiative to secure the needs of our underprivileged?"

She says she has never had an adverse reaction from Negro audiences. "On the contrary, there have been more than 500 requests for reprints of these speeches."

A similar position was taken recently by another minority group, the "Nisei," or American-born Japanese. In San Francisco, Howard Imazeki, editor of the newspaper, Hobukei Mainichi, said in an editorial:

"We have yet to hear any Negro voices blaming themselves for their social maladjustment.

"What we are trying to say most sincerely here is that the Negro leaders should do a little soul-searching of their own."

Nearly 72 years ago, on Aug. 19, 1891, the New York Mail & Express published a pathetic little item. It said some Negro clergymen had met to discuss means of obtaining "better opportunities" for their people.

Today, the Negro drive is for fully equal opportunity, for everything America offers every citizen.

Violence begets violence and the possibility of a white counter-reaction has been noted by many observers. "If that happens," said Hodding Carter, editor of the Greenville, Miss., Delta-Democrat, "all hell will break loose."

During the demonstrations in Birmingham last spring, a white taxi driver said to me, "If they kill any white people, I won't ask questions. I'll just start killin'."

The hour seems late. Is it one minute to 12 now? If so, what raced the hands of the clock?

The story is soon told.

After World War II, the first important federal government action in race relations came when President Truman ordered the end of segregation in the armed forces. He also asked Congress for strong civil rights legislation. It was not granted

Eisenhower Action

During President Eisenhower's second administration, Congress enacted civil rights bills in 1957 and 1960. Using these laws, the administration filed 10 suits on behalf of Negroes' voting rights in the South.

The historic year, however, in the long and anguished struggle over civil rights, was 1954. The U. S. Supreme Court struck down, as unconstitutional, the doctrine of "separate - but - equal" in public schools. Segregation had been a legal fact for 58 years, based on a decision of the Supreme Court in 1896. Now,

8 Per Cent

Today, nearly 10 years after the Supreme Court decision, figures compiled by the Southern Education Reporting Service indicate that about 257,000 Negro children are attending public elementary and high schools with white students in 17 southern and border states and the District of Columbia.

Negro leaders say this is about eight per cent of the school-age total.

Apart from the schools, new sectors opened in the fight for civil rights.

In 1955 and 1956, the Southern Christian Leadership (SCLC) Conference, headed by the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., boycotted segregated bus lines in Montgomery, Ala. They won.

The boycott, or "selective buying," as the Negro leaders prefer to say, began coming into play as a potent weapon in other parts of the South. Negro economists estimate that the purchasing power of the Negro, nationally, is around $15 billion a year.

"Selective buying" has put southern businessmen in a vise. If they integrate some facilities after a Negro boycott, they may be hit by a white boycott.

Along with the boycott came the "sit-in," the tactic of simply sitting quietly in a restaurant, seeking service. Or the "kneel-in," crowds of Negroes praying on the steps of a public building or in a main street, stopping traffic.

shop George W. Barber, of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible Negro voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

In all probability, another factor has played a part in the Negro drive for equality, a subtle, unmeasurable factor — the new African nations.

The American Negro has seen African heads of state being received in the White House and getting the red carpet treatment from Soviet Premier Khrushchev and other powerful leaders. He has seen African diplomats speaking from the rostrum of the United Nations.

This has been a source of pride and encouragement.

But it also is a two-edged sword. "An African in a robe and turban can go into a restaurant or a hotel where I can't go," said a Negro public relations man in Washington. "How silly can segregation be? How do you think this makes me feel?"

Then came another catalyst — Birmingham.

Birmingham

Last spring, Negroes there demonstrated in the streets for desegregation of some facilities in downtown stores and the formation of a permanent biracial said in a recent speech at the University of Wisconsin.

Fear of violence and economic trouble has fostered a "mood of reconciliation" toward racial integration in the South, Ochs said.

Almost overnight after Birmingham, too, Negro demonstrations erupted in the North. Violence flared in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and other northern cities. The Los Angeles Times published a cartoon depicting two Negro figures, one in a menacing posture. It was captioned, "integration not intimidation."

Move in North

In the North, Negro demands focus mainly on jobs and housing. Negro unemployment is high, more than double white unemployment. Labor unions have been accused of discriminating against Negroes. Negro leaders are demanding that a certain quota of Negroes shall be employed on given projects, and even in restaurants.

Another recent development has been a unifying move among seven Negro organizations, some of which had been sniping at each other. They were the NAACP, CORE, SCLC, "SNICK," the National Urban League, the National Council of Negro Women, and the Legal Defense and Education Fund of the NAACP, a separately incorporated organization.

The coalition takes the name Council for United Civil Rights Leadership.

"Our primary concern is to eliminate violence," a spokesman said. "We want to provide a cadre of experienced Negro leaders who will prevent things from getting out of hand and keep irresponsible elements from turning to violence."

Distinctly separate from these groups are the "Black Muslims." They demand, not integration, but total segregation on their own terms. They want the federal government to set aside territory in which they propose to set up a Negro state.

Their leader, Muhammad Elijah, lives in Phoenix, Ariz. In answer to the question of whether the "Muslims" hate white people, he said:

"The Bible teaches us to love

What Lies in the Future for this young Negro family walking along a Harlem street in New York? Will the Negro drive for full equality, now wracking the entire United States, be successful within their lifetime? Will the future hold a discrimination-free life of opportunity for their children? (AP Newsfeatures Photo)

HUTCHINSON, KANS.
NEWS
D. 51,202 S. 52,605

AUG 11 1963

The Deepening Crisis

Negro's Equality Drive Wracks All of U. S.

By RELMAN MORIN

NEW YORK (AP)—The Negro drive for full equality has reached the dimensions of a national convulsion.

It wracks the whole United States, not just the Southern states. It is breaching the invisible racial barriers of the North no less than the visible walls in the South, shattering the complacency of one region, defeating the slow-down strategy of the other.

"Something's got a-hold of me," the Negro is chanting. "We shall overcome," is his anthem.

His movement is in the streets, the courts, the halls of Congress.

It touches schools and employment practices, a seat at a lunch counter and a home in a better neighborhood, the right to vote and the right to worship in any church, the right to sit in any public park and to read a book in any public library—in short, the rights of an American citizen and access to equal opportunity.

Starting as nonviolent, his campaign has engendered violence. The blood of both races has been spilled. No one can say whether more will flow, or where, or how much.

"We will advise our people not to use violence," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, at a news conference in Jackson, Miss. "The Negro can't win in a pitched battle with the whites. He's in the minority."

But can the Negro leaders control their followers, everywhere and at all times? Who, for example, speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

"How can anyone ask me to be nonviolent?" said a Negro war veteran. "That's like putting me back in the line in Korea and loading my rifle with blanks."

Violence begets violence and the possibility of a white counter-reaction has been noted by many observers. "If that happens," said Hodding Carter, editor of the Greenville, Miss., Delta-Democrat, "all hell will break loose."

schools. Segregation had been a legal fact for 58 years, based on a decision of the Supreme Court in 1896. Now, the court ordered the schools to be desegregated "with all deliberate speed."

Negroes and their white sympathizers exulted.

But the segregationist, eying that phrase, "with all deliberate speed," saw an escape hatch. He determined to resist as long as possible. And he did.

Mob violence exploded in Southern and border states.

A climatic point of this stage was Little Rock, Ark. The year was 1957. Exactly 80 years after the end of the reconstruction in the South, federal troops marched into a Southern city again. They used bayonets to disperse crowds around Central High School. And they escorted Negro children into classrooms.

Elsewhere in the South, however, the barriers remained.

Oxford, Miss., and Tuscaloosa, Ala., were still to come.

At Oxford, two men died and scores were injured when a Negro, James H. Meredith, enrolled in the University of Mississippi. Again, federal troops marched, bivouacing on the campus.

At Tuscaloosa, Gov. George C. Wallace stood in the doorway of a University otf Alabama building when Justice Department officials attempted to enroll two Negroes, Vivian Malone and James Hood. A few hours later, he stepped aside when federalized units of the National Guard marched onto the campus. There was no violence.

Long before these incidents, however, the "bright-new-day" jubilance of 1954 had begun to evaporate.

Negro disappointment, as the years passed with little desegregation, turned to bitterness. "Gradualism," the policy of slowly ending segregation, and "tokenism," permitting only a handful of Negro children in schools, offices or factories, became fighting words.

Today, nearly 10 years after the Supreme Court decision, figures compiled by the Southern Educa-

This Report Ends Series

EDITOR'S NOTE— Caught in turmoil of a summer of bitter racial discord, Americans find it difficult at times to assess the dimensions of the crisis, to know what has been gained or lost and where we are heading now. Here, is the last of a special series of Associated Press articles on the integration struggle, is a report by a correspondent who has covered it closely. It sums up the situation to date and looks at changes coming.

Along with the boycott came the "sit-in," the tactic of simply sitting quietly in a restaurant, seeking service. Or the "kneel-in," crowds of Negroes praying on the steps of a public building or in a main street, stopping traffic.

These maneuvers were pioneered by the Congress of Racial Equality, which was founded in 1942 at the University of Chicago. It obtained a foothold in the South with the sit-ins of 1960.

Parallel with action on these fronts, the Negroes began concentrating their efforts in another supremely important field — voter registration. Another Negro organization, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee — "SNICK"—has been active in this work.

The Justice Department has assisted. Since 1961, it has filed 29 suits against officials for refusing to register qualified Negroes. About 50 per cent of these suits have been won.

The Southern Regional Council estimates there are 5,045,000 Negroes of voting age in 11 Southern and border states. About one-fourth, some 1,344,000, are registered.

It is a long, slow process, but the figures for Negro registration are rising, spectacularly in some cases. In Bullock County, Ala., there were four registered Negroes in 1961. Now there are 1,341. This, of course, is a special case.

In all probability, another factor has played a part in the Negro drive for equality, a subtle, unmeasurable factor—the new African nations.

The American Negro has seen African heads of state being received in the White House and getting the red carpet treatment from Soviet Premier Khrushchev and other powerful leaders. He has seen African diplomats speaking from the rostrum of the United Nations.

This has been a source of pride and encouragement.

But it also is a two-edged sword. "An African in a robe and turban can go into a restaurant or a hotel where I can't go," said a Negro public relations man in Washington. "How silly can segregation be? How do you think this makes me feel?"

Another Catalyst

Then came another catalyst—Birmingham.

Last spring, Negroes there demonstrated in the streets for desegregation of some facilities in downtown stores and the formation of a permanent biracial committee to handle racial problems. So many were arrested that the jails overflowed.

Police dogs and fire hoses were used to disperse the crowds. It was not the first time the dogs had been used in Birmingham. The first time was against white men, rioting around "freedom riders" at a bus station. Nor, of course, was Birmingham the only city to use dogs.

Nevertheless, photographs of dogs leaping toward Negroes went around the globe.

For some reason, Birmingham appears to have dramatized the Negro struggle more than any other incident.

"Birmingham engineered the revolution that began in the spring of 1963," Martin Ochs, editor of the Chattanooga Times, said in a recent speech at the University of Wisconsin.

Fear of violence and economic trouble has fostered a "mood of reconciliation" toward racial integration in the south, Ochs said.

Almost overnight after Birmingham, too, Negro demonstrations erupted in the North. Violence flared in New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and other Northern cities. The Los Angeles Times published a cartoon depicting two Negro figures, one in a menacing posture. It was captioned, "Integration, not intimidation."

In the North, Negro demands focus mainly on jobs and housing. Negro unemployment is high, more than double white unemployment. Labor unions have been accused of discriminating against Negroes. Negro leaders are demanding that a certain quota of Negroes shall be employed on given projects, and even in restaurants.

In New York City, to dramatize these and other demands, Negroes entered the offices of Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller and stayed for days in a sit-in. They staged another in the City Hall.

Another recent development has been a unifying move among seven Negro organizations, some of which had been sniping at each other. They were the NAACP, CORE, SCLC, "SNICK," the National Urban League, the National Council of Negro Women, and the Legal Defense and Education Fund of the NAACP, a separately incorporated organization.

The coalition takes the name Council for United Civil Rights Leadership.

Primary Concern

"Our primary concern is to eliminate violence," a spokesman said. "We want to provide a cadre of experienced Negro leaders who will prevent things from getting out of hand and keep irresponsible elements from turning to violence."

Distinctly separate from these groups are the Black Muslims. They demand, not integration, but total segregation on their own terms. They want the federal government to set aside territory in which they propose to set up a Negro state.

Their leader, Elijah Muhammad lives in Phoenix, Ariz. In answer to the question of whether the Muslims hate white people, he said:

"The Bible teaches us to love good and to hate evil. I can't love him (the white) because his is the very essence of evil."

In the vast, complicated and potentially dangerous picture of the racial struggle today, what are the positive sides The principal ones would seem to be these:

1. To a greater degree than ever before, the problem is out in the open. More people, especially in the North but in the South, too, are aware of the intricacies and the injustices. More are thinking about it, seeking solutions.

2. Some degree of communication between the races is being restored in the South. Communications, Southerners say, generally tended to break down after the Supreme Court decision on the schools in 1954. Now, fitfully and with difficulty, Negroes and whites in some parts of the South are sitting down together again.

3. President Kennedy, in conferences with scores of Southern businessmen, clergymen and others, has sought means to desegregate many establishments. He set up a presidential committee on equal job opportunity, replacing two other such committees of the Eisenhower administration. It is headed by Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson.

4. Congress is hearing testimony on the President's package of civil rights legislation. On June 11, he asked Congress to "make a commitment it has not fully made in this century to the proposition that race has no place in American life or law." Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy told the House Judiciary Committee, "This bill before you today embodies that commitment."

5. While the Negroes are crying for rights, a Negro lawyer, Cora T. Walker, is making speeches sharply reminding them of their responsibilities.

Must Share Blame

She tells them: "We are as much to blame for our present condition as the white majority."

On the political side, she says, "There are approximately one million black people in New York City. These Negroes have no restrictions on their voting rights. Yet there are only two elected Negroes in the entire city legislative government."

Of the economic situation, Mrs. Walker says, "In Harlem alone, Negroes spend $150 million a year on automobiles, $80 million on liquor, $75 million on wigs and hair pieces, $100 million on playing the numbers. More than 90 per cent of the businesses in our ghettos are owned, controlled and managed by whites outside of the community. We give minimum support to our own, who are in businesses or professions."

Of some social facts, she says, "We now are the major statistic in juvenile delinquency, dope addiction, crime, and school dropouts. Is this why 75 per cent of the out-of-wedlock children are born of our race?"

Mrs. Walker suggest that Negroes should do more to help each other. "Isn't it our responsibility," she asks, "to take the initiative to secure the needs of our underprivileged"

A similar position was taken recently by another minority group, the Nisei, or American-born Japanese. In San Francisco, Howard Imazeki, editor of the newspaper, Hobukei Mainichi, said in an editorial:

"We have yet to hear any Negro voices blaming themselves for their social maladjustment.

"What we are trying to say most sincerely here is that the Negro leaders should do a little soul-searching of their own."

Nearly 72 years ago, on Aug. 19, 1891, the New York Mail Express published a pathetic little item. It said some Negro clergymen had met to discuss means of obtaining "better opportunities" for their people.

Today, the Negro drive is for fully equal opportunity, for everything America offers every citizen.

spilled. No one can say whether more will flow, or where, or how much.

"We will advise our people not to use violence," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, at a news conference in Jackson, Miss. "The Negro can't win in a pitched battle with the whites. He's in the minority."

But can the Negro leaders control their followers, everywhere and at all times? Who, for example, speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

"How can anyone ask me to be nonviolent?" said a Negro war veteran. "That's like putting me back in the line in Korea and loading my rifle with blanks."

Violence begets violence and the possibility of a white counter-reaction has been noted by many observers. "If that happens," said Hodding Carter, editor of the Greenville, Miss., Delta-Democrat, "all hell will break loose."

During the demonstrations in Birmingham last spring, a white taxi driver said to me, "If they kill any white people, I won't ask any questions. I'll just start killin'."

Hour Seems Late

The hour seems late. Is it one minute to 12 now? If so, what raced the hands of the clock?

The story is soon told.

After World War II, the first important federal government action in race relations came when President Truman ordered the end of segregation in the armed forces. He also asked Congress for strong civil rights legisaltion. It was not granted.

During President Eisenhower's second administration, Congress enacted civil rights bills in 1957 and 1960. Using these laws, the administration filed 10 suits on behalf of Negroes' voting rights in the South.

The historic year, however, in the long and anguished struggle over civil rights, was 1954. The U.S. Supreme Court struck down, as unconstitutional, the doctrine of "separate-but-equal" in public gro, James H. Meredith, enrolled in the University of Mississippi. Again, federal troops marched, bivouacing on the campus.

At Tuscaloosa, Gov. George C. Wallace stood in the doorway of a University otf Alabama building when Justice Department officials attempted to enroll two Negroes, Vivian Malone and James Hood. A few hours later, he stepped aside when federalized units of the National Guard marched onto the campus. There was no violence.

Long before these incidents, however, the "bright-new-day" jubilance of 1954 had begun to evaporate.

Negro disappointment, as the years passed with little desegregation, turned to bitterness. "Gradualism," the policy of slowly ending segregation, and "tokenism," permitting only a handful of Negro children in schools, offices or factories, became fighting words.

Today, nearly 10 years after the Supreme Court decision, figures compiled by the Southern Education Reporting Service indicate that about 257,000 Negro children are attending public elementary and high schools with white students in 17 Southern and border states and the District of Columbia.

New Sectors

Negro leaders say this is about 8 per cent of the school-age total.

Apart from the schools, new sectors opened in the fight for civil rights.

In 1955 and 1956, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, headed by the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., boycotted segregated bus lines in Montgomery, Ala. They won.

The boycott, or "selective buying," as the Negro leaders prefer to say, began coming into play as a potent weapon in other parts of the South. Negro economists estimate that the purchasing power of the Negro, nationally, is around $15 billion a year.

"Selective buying" has put Southern businessmen in a vise. If they integrate some facilities after a Negro boycott, they may be hit by a white boycott.

1942 at the University of Chicago. It obtained a foothold in the South with the sit-ins of 1960.

Parallel with action on these fronts, the Negroes began concentrating their efforts in another supremely important field — voter registration. Another Negro organization, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee — "SNICK"—has been active in this work.

The Justice Department has assisted. Since 1961, it has filed 29 suits against officials for refusing to register qualified Negroes. About 50 per cent of these suits have been won.

The Southern Regional Council estimates there are 5,045,000 Negroes of voting age in 11 Southern and border states. About one-fourth, some 1,344,000, are registered.

It is a long, slow process, but the figures for Negro registration are rising, spectacularly in some cases. In Bullock County, Ala.,

Last spring, Negroes there demonstrated in the streets for desegregation of some facilities in downtown stores and the formation of a permanent biracial committee to handle racial problems. So many were arrested that the jails overflowed.

Police dogs and fire hoses were used to disperse the crowds. It was not the first time the dogs had been used in Birmingham. The first time was against white men, rioting around "freedom riders" at a bus station. Nor, of course, was Birmingham the only city to use dogs.

Nevertheless, photographs of dogs leaping toward Negroes went around the globe.

For some reason, Birmingham appears to have dramatized the Negro struggle more than any other incident.

"Birmingham engineered the revolution that began in the spring of 1963," Martin Ochs, editor of the Chattanooga Times, said in a in the City Hall.

Another recent development has been a unifying move among seven Negro organizations, some of which had been sniping at each other. They were the NAACP, CORE, SCLC, "SNICK," the National Urban League, the National Council of Negro Women, and the Legal Defense and Education Fund of the NAACP, a separately incorporated organization.

The coalition takes the name Council for United Civil Rights Leadership.

Primary Concern

"Our primary concern is to eliminate violence," a spokesman said. "We want to provide a cadre of experienced Negro leaders who will prevent things from getting out of hand and keep irresponsible

2. Some degree of communication between the races is being restored in the South. Communications, Southerners say, generally tended to break down after the Supreme Court decision on the schools in 1954. Now, fitfully and with difficulty, Negroes and whites in some parts of the South are sitting down together again.

3. President Kennedy, in conferences with scores of Southern businessmen, clergymen and others, has sought means to desegregate many establishments. He set up a presidential committee on equal job opportunity, replacing two other such committees of the Eisenhower administration. It is headed by Vice President Lyndon B. Johnson.

4. Congress is hearing testimony on the President's package of civil rights legislation. On June 11, he asked Congress to "make a commitment it has not fully made ing the numbers. More than 90 per cent of the businesses in our ghettos are owned, controlled and managed by whites outside of the community. We give minimum support to our own, who are in businesses or professions."

Of some social facts, she says, "We now are the major statistic in juvenile delinquency, dope addiction, crime, and school dropouts. Is this why 75 per cent of the out-of-wedlock children are born of our race?"

Mrs. Walker suggest that Negroes should do more to help each other. "Isn't it our responsibility," she asks, "to take the initiative to secure the needs of our underprivileged"

A similar position was taken recently by another minority group, the Nisei, or American-born Japanese. In San Francisco, Howard Imazeki, editor of the newspaper,

The Indianapolis Star
D. 218,583 S. 342,153

AUG 1 1 1963

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION RULING BROKE OLD SETUP

1954 Was The Historic Year In Battle For Civil Rights

By RELMAN MORIN

New York (AP)—The Negro drive for full equality has reached the dimensions of a national convulsion.

It wracks the whole United States, not just the Southern states. It is breaching the invisible racial barriers of the North no less than the visible walls in the South, shattering the complacency of one region, defeating the slowdown strategy of the other.

"Something's got a-hold of me," the Negro is chanting. "We shall overcome," is his anthem.

His movement is in the streets, the courts, the halls of Congress.

It touches schools and employment practices, a seat at a lunch counter and a home in a better neighborhood, the right to vote and the right to worship in any church, the right to sit in any public park and to read a book in any public library—in short, the rights of an American citizen and access to equal opportunity.

STARTING as non-violent, his campaign has engendered violence. The blood of both races has been spilled. No one can say whether more will flow, or where, or how much.

"We will advise our people not to use violence," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), at a news conference in Jackson, Miss. "The Negro can't win in a pitched battle with the whites. He's in the minority."

But can the Negro leaders control their followers, everywhere and at all times? Who, for example, speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

"How can anyone ask me to be non-violent?" said a Negro war veteran. "That's like putting me back in the line in Korea and loading my rifle with blanks."

VIOLENCE begets violence and the possibility of a white counter-reaction has been noted by many observers. "If that happens," said Hodding Carter, editor of the Greenville (Miss.) marched, bivouacing on the campus.

AT TUSCALOOSA, Governor George C. Wallace stood in the doorway of a University of Alabama building when Justice Department officials attempted to enroll two Negroes, Vivian Malone and James Hood. A few hours later, he stepped aside when Federalized units of the National Guard marched onto the campus. There was no violence.

Long before these incidents, however, the "bright-new-day" jubilance of 1954 had begun to evaporate.

Negro disappointment, as the years passed with little desegregation, turned to bitterness. "Gradualism," the policy of slowly ending segregation and "tokenism," permitting only a handful of Negro children in schools, offices or factories, became fighting words.

Today, nearly 10 years after the Supreme Court decision, figures compiled by the Southern education reporting service indicate that about 257,000 Negro children are attending public elementary and high schools with white students in 17 Southern and border states and the District of Columbia.

NEGRO LEADERS say this is about 8 per cent of the school-age total.

Apart from the schools, new sectors opened in the fight for civil rights.

In 1955 and 1956, the Southern Christian Leadership (SCLC) Conference, headed by the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., boycotted segregated bus lines in Montgomery, Ala. They won.

The boycott, or "selective buying," as the Negro leaders prefer to say, began coming into play as a potent weapon in other parts of the South. Negro economists estimate that the purchasing power of the Negro, nationally, is around $15 billion a year.

"Selective buying" has put Southern businessmen in a vise. If they integrate some facilities after a Negro boycott, they may be hit by a white boycott.

ALONG WITH the boycott came the "sit-in," the tactic of simply sitting quietly in a restaurant within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of 2 million new Negro voters, North and South."

In all probability, another factor has played a part in the Negro drive for equality, a subtle, unmeasurable factor—the new African nations.

The American Negro has seen African heads of state being received in the White House and getting the red carpet treatment from Soviet Premier Khrushchev and other powerful leaders. He has seen African diplomats speaking from the rostrum of the United Nations.

THIS HAS been a source of pride and encouragement.

But it also is a two-edged sword. "An African in a robe and turban can go into a restaurant or a hotel where I can't go," said a Negro public relations man in Washington. "How silly can segregation be? How do you think this makes me feel?"

Then came another catalyst—Birmingham.

Last spring, Negroes there demonstrated in the streets for desegregation of some facilities in downtown stores and the formation of a permanent biracial committee to handle racial problems. So many were arrested that the jails overflowed.

Police dogs and fire hoses were used to disperse the crowds. It was not the first time the dogs had been used in Birmingham. The first time was against white men, rioting around "Freedom Riders" at a bus station. Nor, of course, was Birmingham the only city to use dogs.

NEVERTHELESS, photographs of dogs leaping toward Negroes went around the globe.

1. To a greater degree than ever before, the problem is out in the open. More people, especially in the North but in the South, too, are aware of the intricacies and the injustices. More are thinking about it, seeking solutions.

2. Some degree of communication between the races is being restored in the South. Communications, Southerners say, generally tended to break down after the Supreme Court decision on the schools in 1954. Now, fitfully and with difficulty, Negroes and whites in some parts of the South are sitting down together again. One Southern newspaper publisher called such a meeting in his own plant—and deliberately placed the conference table where it could be seen through the window from the sidewalk.

3. President Kennedy, in conferences with scores of Southern businessmen, clergymen and others, has sought means to desegregate many establishments. He set up a presidential committee on equal job opportunity, replacing two other such committees of the Eisenhower administration. It is headed by Vice-President Lyndon B. Johnson.

4. Congress is hearing testimony on the President's package of civil rights legislation. On June 11, he asked Congress to "make a commitment it has not fully made in this century to the proposition that race has no place in American life or law." Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy told the House Judiciary Committee, "This bill before you today embodies that commitment."

5. While the Negroes are crying for rights, a Negro lawyer, Mrs. Cora T. Walker, is making speeches sharply reminding them of their responsibilities. She tells them:

"We are as much to blame for our present condition as the white majority."

ON THE POLITICAL side, she says, "there are approximately one million black-people in New York City. These Negroes have no restrictions on their voting rights. Yet there are only two elected Negroes in the entire city legislative government."

Of the economic situation, Mrs. Walker says, "in Harlem alone, Negroes spend $150,000,000 a year on automobiles, $80,000,000 on liquor, $75,000,000 on wigs and hair pieces and $100,000,000 on playing the numbers. More than 90 per cent of the business in our ghettos are owned, controlled and managed by whites outside of the community. We give minimum support to our own, who are in businesses or professions."

OF SOME social facts, she says, "we now are the major statistic in juvenile delinquency, dope addiction, crime, and school drop-outs. Is this why 75 per cent of of the out-of-wedlock children are born of our race?"

Mrs. Walker suggests that Negroes should do more to help each other. "Isn't it our responsibility," she asks, "to take the initiative to secure the needs of our underprivileged?"

She says she has never had an adverse reaction from Negro audiences. "On the contrary, there have been more than 500 requests for reprints of these speeches."

A similar position was taken recently by another minority group, the "Nisei," or American-born Japanese. In San Francisco, Howard Imazeki, editor of the newspaper, Hobukei Mainichi, said in an editorial:

"We have yet to hear any Negro voices blaming themselves for their social maladjustment."

Nearly 72 years ago, on Aug. 19, 1891, the New York Mail & Express published a pathetic little item. It said some Negro clergymen had met to discuss means of obtaining "better opportunities" for their people.

Today, the Negro drive is for fully equal opportunity, for everything America offers every citizen.

For some reason, Birmingham appears to have dramatized the Negro struggle more than any other incident.

IN THE NORTH, Negro demands focus mainly on jobs and housing. Negro unemployment is high, more than double white unemployment. Labor unions have been accused of discriminating against Negroes. Negro leaders are demanding that a certain quota of Negroes shall be employed on given projects, and even in restaurants.

In New York City, to dramatize these and other demands, Negroes entered the offices of Governor Nelson Rockefeller and stayed for days in a "sit-in." They staged another in the City Hall.

WHAT LIES IN THE FUTURE FOR THEM?
Young Negro Family Walking Along Harlem Street conference in Jackson, Miss. "The Negro can't win in a pitched battle with the whites. He's in the minority."

But can the Negro leaders control their followers, everywhere and at all times? Who, for example, speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

"How can anyone ask me to be non-violent?" said a Negro war veteran. "That's like putting me back in the line in Korea and loading my rifle with blanks."

VIOLENCE begets violence and the possibility of a white counter-reaction has been noted by many observers. "If that happens," said Hodding Carter, editor of the Greenville (Miss.) Delta-Democrat, "All hell will break lose."

During the demonstrations in Birmingham last spring, a white taxi driver said to me, "If they kill any white people, I won't ask any questions. I'll just start killin'."

The hour seems late. Is it one minute to 12 now? If so, what raced the hands of the clock?

The story is soon told.

After World War II, the first important Federal government action in race relations came when President Truman ordered the end of segregation in the armed forces. He also asked Congress for strong civil rights legislation. It was not granted.

DURING President Eisenhower's second administration, Congress enacted civil rights bills in 1957 and 1960. Using these laws, the administration filed 10 suits on behalf of Negroes' voting rights in the South.

The historic year, however, in the long and anguished struggle over civil rights, was 1954. The U.S. Supreme Court struck down, as unconstitutional, the doctrine of "separate-but-equal" in public schools. Segregation had been a legal fact for 58 years, based on a decision of the Supreme Court in 1896. Now, the court ordered the schools to be desegregated "with all deliberate speed.

Negroes and their white sympathizers exulted.

But the segregationist, eyeing that phrase, "with all deliberate speed," saw an escape hatch. He determined to resist as long as possible. And he did.

MOB VIOLENCE exploded in Southern and border states.

A climactic point of this stage was Little Rock, Ark. The year was 1957. Exactly 80 years after the end of the Reconstruction in the South, Federal troops marched into a Southern city again. They used bayonets to disperse crowds around Central High School. And they escorted Negro children into classrooms.

Elsewhere in the South, however, the barriers remained.

Oxford, Miss., and Tuscaloosa, Ala., were still to come.

At Oxford, two men died and scores were injured when a Negro, James H. Meredith, enrolled in the University of Mississippi. Again Federal troops headed by the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., boycotted segregated bus lines in Montgomery, Ala. They won.

The boycott, or "selective buying," as the Negro leaders prefer to say, began coming into play as a potent weapon in other parts of the South. Negro economists estimate that the purchasing power of the Negro, nationally, is around $15 billion a year.

"Selective buying" has put Southern businessmen in a vise. If they integrate some facilities after a Negro boycott, they may be hit by a white boycott.

ALONG WITH the boycott came the "sit-in," the tactic of simply sitting quietly in a restaurant, seeking service. Or the "kneel-in," crowds of Negroes praying on the steps of a public building or in a main street, stopping traffic.

These maneuvers were pioneered by the Committee on Racial Equality (CORE) which was founded in 1942 at the University of Chicago. It obtained a foothold in the South with the "sit-in" of 1960.

Parallel with action on these fronts, the Negroes began concentrating their efforts in another supremely important field—voter registration. Another Negro organization, the Student Non-Violent Co-Ordinating Committee ("SNICK") has been active in this work.

The Justice Department has assisted. Since 1961, it has filed 29 suits against officials for refusing to register qualified Negroes. About 50 per cent of these suits have been won.

THE SOUTHERN Regional Council estimates there are 5,045,000 Negroes of voting age in 11 Southern and border states. About one fourth, some 1,344,000, are registered.

Many tactics have been used to discourage Negroes from registering — gerrymandering, intimidation, widely-spaced meetings of registration boards, throwing out Negro applications on technicalities.

So concerted voter-registration drives began. Students went through Negro communities, ringing doorbells. Officials stationed themselves in public buildings in the South, buttonholing every Negro who came in, whatever his business, and urging him to register, there and then. Voter "clinics" were set up to instruct Negroes in filling out the application forms, and in meeting the technicalities.

IT IS A LONG, slow process, but the figures for Negro registration are rising, spectacularly in some cases. In Bullock County, Ala., there were four registered Negroes in 1961. Now there are 1,341. This, of course, is a special case.

Of the registration drives, Bishop George W. Barber, of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible Negro voter crowds. It was time the dogs had been used in Birmingham. The first time was against white men, rioting around "Freedom Riders" at a bus station. Nor, of course, was Birmingham the only city to use dogs.

NEVERTHELESS, photographs of dogs leaping toward Negroes went around the globe.

1. To a greater degree than ever before, the problem is out in the open.

House Judiciary Committee, "This bill before you today embodies that commitment."

5. While the Negroes are crying for rights, a Negro lawyer, Mrs. Cora T. Walker, is making speeches sharply reminding them of their responsibilities. She tells them:

"We are as much to blame for our present condition as the white majority."

ON THE POLITICAL side, she says, "there are or American-born Jap

In San Francisco, H Imazeki, editor of the paper, Hobukei Ma said in an editorial:

"We have yet to he Negro voices blaming selves for their socia adjustment."

Nearly 72 years a
Aug. 19, 1891, the York Mail & Expres lished a pathetic littl
It said some Negro men had met to means of obtaining

JOHNSON CITY, TENN.
PRESS-CHRONICLE
D. 7,248 S. 23,048

AUG 11 1963

Deepening Crisis . . . a summary . . .

Negro drive for full equality now in stage of U.S. convulsion

EDITOR'S NOTE — Caught in the turmoil of a summer of bitter racial discord, Americans find it difficult at times to assess the dimensions of the crisis, to know what has been gained or lost and where we are heading now. Here, in the last of a special series of Assocaited Press articles on the integration struggle, is a report by a correspondent who has covered it closely. It sums up the situation to date and looks at changes coming.)

By RELMAN MORIN

NEW YORK, (AP) — The Negro drive for full equality has reached the dimensions of a national convulsion.

It wracks the whole United States, not just the Southern states. It is breaching the invisible racial barriers of the North no less than the visible walls in the South, shattering the complacency of one region, defeating the slow-down strategy of the other.

"Something's got a-hold of me," the Negro is chanting. "We shall overcome," is his anthem.

His movement is in the streets, the courts, the halls of Congress.

It touches schools and employment practices, a seat at a lunch counter and a home in a better neighborhood, the right to vote and the right to worship in any church, the right to sit in any public park and to read a book in any public library — in short, the rights of an American citizen and access to equal opportunity.

Engendered Violence

Starting as non - violent, his campaign has engendered violence. The blood of both races has been spilled. No one can say whether more will flow, or where, or how much.

"We will advise our people not to use violence," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), at a news conference in Jackson, Miss. "The Negro can't win in a pitched battle with the whites. He's in the minority."

But can the Negro leaders control their followers, everywhere and at all times? Who, for example, speaks for Harlem, the giant Negro community in New York City?

"How can anyone ask me to be non-violent?" said a Negro war veteran. "That's like putting me back in the line in Korea and loading my rifle with blanks."

Violence begets violence and the possibility of a white counter-reaction has been noted by many observers. "If that happens," said Hodding Carter, editor of the Greenville, Miss., Delta-Democrat, "all hell will break loose."

'I'll Just Start Killing'

During the demonstrations in Birmingham last spring, a white taxi driver said to me, "If they kill any white people, I won't ask any questions. I'll just start killin'."

The hour seems late. Is it one minute to 12 now? If so, what raced the hands of the clock?

The story is soon told.

After World War II, the first important federal government action in race relations came when President Truman ordered the end of segregation in the armed forces. He also asked Congress for strong civil rights legislation. It was not granted.

During President Eisenhower's second administration, Congress enacted civil rights bills in 1957 and 1960. Using these laws, the administration filed 10 suits on behalf of Negroes' voting rights in the south.

The historic year, however, in the long and anguished struggle over civil rights, was 1954. The U. S. Supreme Court struck down, as unconstitutional, the doctrine of "separate - but-equal" in public schools. Segregation had been a legal fact for 58 years, based on a decision of the Supreme Court in 1896. Now, the court ordered the schools to be desegregated "with all deliberate speed."

Negroes and their white sympathizers exulted.

Escape Hatch

But the segregationist, eying that phrase, "with all deliberate speed," saw an escape hatch. He determined to resist as long as possible. And he did.

Mob violence exploded in Southern and border states.

A climactic point of this stage was Little Rock, Ark. The year was 1957. Exactly 80 years after the end of the reconstruction in the South, federal troops marched into a Southern city again. They used bayonets to disperse crowds around Central High School. And they escorted Negro children into classrooms.

Elsewhere in the South, however, the barriers remained.

Oxford, Miss., and Tuscaloosa, Ala., were still to come.

At Oxford, two men died and scores were injured when a negro, James H. Meredith, enrolled in the University of Mississippi.

Again, federal troops marched, bivouacing on the campus.

At Tuscaloosa, Gov. George C. Wallace stood in the doorway of a University of Alabama building when Justice Department officials attempted to enroll two Negroes, Vivian Malone and James Hood. A few hours later, he stepped aside when federalized units of the National Guard marched onto the campus. There was no violence.

Long before these incidents, however, the "bright - new-day" jubilance of 1954 had begun to evaporate.

Bitterness

Negro disappointment, as the years passed with little desegregation, turned to bitterness. "Gradualism," the policy of slowly ending segregation, and "tokenism," permitting only a handful of Negro chidlren in schools, offices or factories, became fighting words.

Today, nearly 10 years after the Supreme Court decision, figures complicated by the Southern Education Reporting Service indicate that about 257-000 Negro children are attending public elementary and high schools with white students in 17 Southern and border states and the District of Columbia.

Negro leaders say this is about eight per cent of the school-age total.

Apart from the schools, new sectors opened in the fight for civil rights.

In 1955 and 1956, the Southern Christian Leadership (SCLC) Conference, headed by the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., boycotted segregated bus lines in Montgomery, Ala. They won.

The boycott, or "selective buying," as the Negro leaders prefer to say, began coming into play as a potent weapon in other parts of the South. Negro economists estimate that the purchasing power of the Negro, nationally, is around $15 billion a year.

'Selective Buying'

"Selective buying" has put Southern businessmen in a vise. If they integrate some facilities after a Negro boycott, they may be hit by a white boycott.

Along with the boycott came the "sit-in," the tactic of simply sitting quietly in a restaurant, seeking service. Or the "kneel - in," crowds of Negroes praying on the steps of a public building or in a main street, stopping traffic.

These maneuvers were pioneered by the Committee on Radical Equality (CORE) which was founded in 1942 at the University of Chicago. It obtained a foothold in the South with the "sit-in" of 1960.

Parallel with action on these fronts, the Negroes began concentrating their efforts in another supremely important field-voter registration. Another Negro organization, the Student Non - Violent Coordinating Committee ("SNICK") has been active in this work.

The Justice Department has assisted. Since 1961, it has filed 29 suits against officials for refusing to register qualified Negroes. About 50 per cent of these suits have been won.

The Southern Regional Council estimates there are 5,045,000 Negroes of voting age in 11 Southern and border states. About one fourth, some 1,344,-000, are registered.

Many tactics have been used to discourage Negroes from registering — gerrymandering, intimidation, widely - spaced meetings of registration boards, throwing out Negro applications on technicalities.

So concerted voter - registration drives began. Students went through Negro communities, ringing doorbells. Officials stationed themselves in public buildings in the South, buttonholing every Negro who came in, whatever his business, and urging him to register, there and then. Voter "clinics" were set up to instruct Negroes in filling out the application forms, and in meeting the technicalities.

Long, Slow Process

It is a long, slow process, but the figures for Negro registration are rising, spectacularly in some cases. In Bullock County, Ala., there were four registered Negroes in 1961. Now there are 1,341. This, of course, is a special case.

Of the registration drives, Bishop George W. Barber, of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible Negro voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters. North and South."

In all probability, another factor has played a part in the Negro drive for equality, a subtle, unmeasurable factor — —the new African nations.

The American Negro has seen African heads of state being received in the White House and getting the red carpet treatment from Soviet Premier Khrushchev and other powerful leaders. He has seen African diplomats speaking from the rostrum of the United Nations.

This has been a source of pride and encouragement.

But it also is a two-edged sword. "An African in a robe and turban can go into a restaurant or a hotel where I can't go," said a negro public relations man in Washington. "How silly can segregation be? How do you think this makes me feel?"

Then came another catalyst— Birmingham.

Last spring, Negroes there demonstrated in the streets for desegration of some facilities in downtown stores and the formation of a permanent biracial committee to handle racial problems. So many were arrested that the jails overflowed.

Police dogs and fire hoses were used to disperse the crowds. It was not the first time the dogs had been used in Birmingham. The first time was against white men, rioting around "freedom riders" at a bus station. Nor, of course, was Birmingham the only city to use dogs.

Nevertheless, photographs of dogs leaping toward Negroes went around the globe.

For some reason, Birmingham appears to have dramatized the Negro struggle more than any other incident.

Fear of violence and economic trouble has fostered a "mood of reconciliations" toward racial integration in the South, Ochs said.

MONROE, LA.
WORLD
D: 27,587 S. 41,061

AUG 11 1963

FROM THE EDITOR'S DESK

The Week In Focus

by Jack Gates

ON THE DOMESTIC SIDE

The nation's heart went out the past week to President and Mrs. Kennedy over the death of their son — Patrick Bouvier Kennedy. The child died approximately 39 hours after his birth by caesarean delivery from a respiratory ailment.

The boy was almost 5½ weeks premature and developed the ailment shortly after his birth in the Otis Air Force Base hospital. He was rushed to the Children's Hospital Medical Center at Boston where breathing aid facilities were available. His condition seesawed during his 34 hours in the hospital. On Thursday, he was believed better and the President so reported to his wife.

KENNEDY

But the child became worse despite a special chamber which had been constructed to aid its breathing and died around 2:30 a.m. CST Friday. The President was in the room at the time and so was his brother, Attorney General Robert Kennedy. Later in the day, the sorrowing president visited his wife at Otis and notified her of the death. The disease which snuffed out the life of the child is known as idiopathic respiratory distress syndrome. At week's end, Mrs. Kennedy's condition was described as excellent.

A SURVEY, meanwhile, shows that prayer and bible reading will continue this fall in many U.S. public schools despite the Supreme Court's ruling that such religious exercises are unconstitutional. The survey turned up only two states — Pennsylvania and California which appear to be acting on the court's suggestion. In Alabama, the state board of education defied the Supreme Court and made Bible reading part of the required curriculum of public schools. And Gov. George Wallace said if the courts rule out the practice in a specific Alabama school "I'm going to that school and read it myself.". . .

WAS A NEW romantic interest behind the separation of Henry Ford II and his wife. Some reports say it is and they list the new interest as Mrs. Christina Austin, a blonde Italian divorcee. Mrs. Austin told newsmen that she knew Ford and his wife — but was just a good friend. Ford is the grandson of auto pioneer Henry Ford.

IN JOLIET, Illinois, an 11-year-old boy who said he strangled a little girl because of an idea he got while watching television was committed to the custody of the Illinois Youth Commission. Because of his age, the youth, Kenneth Warner — could not be prosecuted on a criminal charge. Officers quoted the boy as saying he killed the girl after practicing by choking cats and kittens. . .

A MAJOR report is expected to be released this weekend dealing with the psychiatric aspects of the desegregation of southern schools. The findings are expected to be controversial. The report will be published by the Southern Regional Council and the Anti-Defamation League. The study was produced by Dr. Robert M. Coles, a Boston psychiatrist who spent two years gathering the clinical material. . . .

IN NEIGHBORING Mississippi, a Democratic election for governor was held the past week, with Lieutenant Gov. Paul Johnson and former Governor J. P. Coleman emerging as the two top candidates. They will enter a runoff on August 27. Johnson, who was the top man, is expected to emerge the victor in the runoff . . .

CONCORD, N.C.
TRIBUNE
D 9,919 S. 10,067
AUG 1 1963

THE DEEPENIN

The Negro Goal: Two

EDITOR'S NOTE—In a potentially powerful weapon in his fight against segregation, the Negro is enthusiastcally taking part today in a massive vote registration campaign. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Fourth in a specialized series of articles by The Associated Press on the racial crisis.

By RELMAN MORIN

TUSKEGEE, Ala. (AP) — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote.

She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly, studying it line by line, she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says, the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days, she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says, simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people, thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here, potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal, attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Elsewhere, Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered, they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children, they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and

HE DEEPENING CRISIS: 4

al: Two Million New Voters

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say, a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so, there and then.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone, during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

Speaking of the voter registration drives, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters, North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties, a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month, he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000, of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive, said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day, while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle, a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 affiants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees, were rejected for such inconsequential, formal, technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county, Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution, and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. White, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simply provisions as, 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report," he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy, and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

NEXT: THE ECONOMIC EFFECTS

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
NEWS-FREE PRESS
D. 56,606

AUG 12 1963

No Epidemic of 'Hatred'

The Southern Regional Council is an Atlanta-based organization dedicated to pressing for racial integration. It has been joined by the integration-promoting Anti-Defamation League of the B'nai B'rith in a series of sociological reports designed to advance their cause.

While most of the publications resulting from this effort are the usual propaganda that might be expected, in the most recent release there is a statement that is highly significant, and is especially so because of its source. The statement is this:

"The particularly enraged person, be he teacher or student (in an integrated situation), is relatively rare among millions of Southerners."

This really should be no surprise—but it is a fact that many people overlook. The integrationists, in their zeal to force their idea of social amalgamation upon the nation, upon public and private institutions and upon individuals, have often allowed themselves to characterize those who disagree with them, those who want to maintain free choice of associations, as being guilty of "race hatred."

As a general matter, there is no such thing as "race hatred" prevalent in the South.

Some individuals of both Negro and white races have engaged in excesses. But the general white population entertains no hatred for the Negro race, and despite organized agitation attempts the Negro race in general seems to feel no pervading hatred for whites.

There are differences of point of view, to be sure. But hatred is an isolated disease, not an epidemic one.

It is interesting to find an integrationist organization is willing to admit that "the enraged person . . . is relatively rare among millions of Southerners."

Southern people of both races have lived in harmony for many years during which greatest adversity has not been allowed to prevent progress for all. We trust that Southern people of both races will weather the agitation of today and will continue to make progress tomorrow. That does not mean that there will be a surrender on the part of the majority to total social integration of the races; no such thing should be expected, for alternate options likely will develop in every case of major forced race-mixing. But the good will of the people of the South should prevail despite provocations.

Hatred has never been the ruling force in racial relations in the South and should never be.

GADSDEN, ALA.
TIMES
D. 25,348 S. 24,059

AUG 12 1963

Material Goes To Wallace

MOBILE (AP) — Material is in the mail headed for Gov. George Wallace today which the Mobile post of the American Legion says will connect Alabamians Behind Local Education (Able) with the Southern Regional Council.

Peter V. Crolich Jr., commander of the post, said he mailed copy of instructions which came from the Southern Regional Council, Inc., of Atlantaa.

The post's chairman of the Committee on Un-American Activities, Frank B. Shottgen, said he had furnished identical material to Atty. Gen. Richmond Flowers.

Able has been under attack by Wallace and the local American Legion post on charges that it was trying to discredit Wallace and that it preaches integration of schools.

Mrs. Hollis J. Wiseman, ABLE president, said Wallace "obviously has been misinformed." She said the organization took no stand on racial matters and is not led by representatives of the Southern Regional Council "or any other organization."

She said ABLE's primary cause is to see that Mobile students continue to receive education in the face of court-ordered desegregation.

THE MOBILE REGISTER
MOBILE, ALA.
D. 41,393 S. 37,782

AUG 12 1963

Legion Files New Data In Seeking ABLE Probe

American Legion officials at Mobile Sunday reported new moves in an effort to bring about an investigation of the local organization known as "ABLE" which was incorporated with the announced purpose of keeping the public schools open under all conditions.

Peter V. Crolich Jr., commander of Lamar Y. McLeod Post No. 3 of the Legion, said he has mailed to Gov. George C. Wallace at Montgomery a copy of instructions purportedly issued by ABLE to "key workers."

This copy, Crolich said, was accompanied by a cover sheet which, he stated, was endorsed by the executive committee of Lamar Y. McLeod Post at a meeting on Monday, Aug. 5. The cover sheet carried comments to the effect that ABLE has a connection with the Southern Regional Council, Inc., of Atlanta, Ga., and the suggestion that there should be a further investigation.

FLOWERS GETS MATERIAL

Frank B. Schottgen, chairman of the committee on un-American activities of Lamar Y. McLeod Post, announced Sunday night that he has furnished identical material concerning ABLE and the Southern Regional Council to Atty. Gen. Richmond Flowers.

Schottgen made his announcement upon his return from Montgomery where he attended a state Legion conference. He said Atty. Gen. Flowers promised to study the material.

Gov. Wallace last Friday issued a statement charging that ABLE is led by representatives of the Southern Regional Council, Inc., and that ABLE's purpose is the integration of the Mobile County public school system. The governor said Sen. John M. Tyson and Rep. Mylan R. Engel joined him in his statement.

"ABLE" is the name commonly used for the organization's incorporated name of Alabamians Behind Local Education. Mrs. Hollis J. Wiseman, president of ABLE, has declared that Gov. Wallace "obviously has been misinformed" and she has asserted that the organizaiton is not led by representatives of the Southern Regional Council or "any other organization."

THE COMMERCIAL APPEAL
MEMPHIS, TENN.
D. 216,358 S. 260,847

AUG 1 5 1963

Funds Flowing To Civil Rights

Wealthy New Yorker Seen As Source Of Million For Racial Groups

From The Commercial Appeal Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON, Aug. 14. — Stephen R. Currie, a wealthy 32-year-old New Yorker, has taken the lead in fund-raising activities for civil rights organizations.

The New York Times reported the Taconic Foundation, established by the New Yorker and his wife in 1958, has contributed one million dollars to civil rights organizations.

In addition, he arranged a breakfast at the Hotel Carlyle in New York on June 19 at which 96 corporation and foundation leaders contributed nearly $800,000. Much of this, as well as other funds, will be used to finance the Aug. 28 civil rights demonstrations in Washington. The budget for this project has been set at $1,500,000.

The New Yorker, wealthy in his own right, is married to the former Audrey Bruce, daughter of David K. E. Bruce, United States ambassador to Britain and Ambassador Bruce's former wife, Mrs. Ailsa Mellon Bruce, a daughter of the late multi-millionaire Andrew Mellon.

"The Curriers established the (Taconic) Foundation," the Times reported, "because they believed that they, as possessors of wealth and the advantages that went with it, had a deep obligation to the less privileged."

The Times reported available figures show the Taconi Foundation contributed $162,000 to race relations in 1960, $260,200 in 1961, and $318,500 in 1962. And already this year the foundation has committed $400,000 to the same work.

Of the $400,000 committed this year, the Times said, $125,000 is going to the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta, an organization which long has promoted Negro rights in the South. Another $80,000 is going to the Urban League, $25,000 to the NAACP legal defense and educational fund, and $70,000 to "miscellaneous projects."

The Times credited the wealthy New Yorker with helping to co-ordinate the fund-raising activities of the various pro-Negro organizations.

"Largely through his efforts," the Times said, "seven of them formed for this purpose the Council for Civil Rights Leadership (CCRL), and the Committee for Welfare, Education and Legal Defense (WE.L.D.).

The New Republic Magazine reports in the current issue that W.E.L.D. was established to receive tax-deductible contributions. Contributions to CCRL will not be tax-deductible.

New Republic also reported that $300,000 of the $800,000 raised at the June 19 breakfast went in nontax-deductible form to four civil rights organizations. It said the NAACP was allocated $125,000, C.O.R.E. $100,000, Rev. Martin Luther King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference $50,000, and the Student Non-violent Co-ordinating Committee $15,000 with a promise of more later.

The New Republic said tax-deductible allocations included $125,000 to the Urban League,

TOPIC IS ADVERTISING — Ernest Lee (left) president of Merrill Kremer, Inc., advertising agency, and Dr. Robert M. Cooper, (right), executive vice president of the firm, chat with Raymond Skinner, president of Forest Hill Dairies, Inc., during an open house at the agency's new quarters at 641 South Cooper. The dairy has been a client of the agency 31 years. —Staff Photo

The Atlanta Journal
"COVERS DIXIE LIKE THE DEW"
D. 259,003

AUG 2 0 1963

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS:

GOP Lambasted on Milk Price Position

The Editors: The Young Republicans should be honest enough to give both sides of the milk price question.

May I suggest that they analyze the advance in the price of milk for each five-year period covering the last 30 years? Also they should show the increase in salaries and wages for the same period.

Let them show the increase in cost of production of milk for the same period, such as increase in the cost of land, buildings, automobiles, trucks, milking equipment, all other farm equipment, and the cost of cows and feed.

Is it not just as fair to fix the price of milk by law as it is to fix the minimum wages?

If the dairymen were organized as well as union labor and had tied the price of milk to the wage increase for the past 30 years, milk would be a dollar per quart instead of a dollar per gallon.

Our Young Republicans should attack the real issues that face us today, such as, giving our tax money to Communist enemies and corruption and extravagance in government. These are far more important to the people of Georgia and the nation than the price of a quart of milk, which is probably the lowest cost food commodity on the market today. A tax reduction would leave the consumer with more dollars with which to buy milk.

E. M. THORNE.

Millen.

'Why Accommodate Rabble-Rousers?'

The Editors: I have just read

Letters should not exceed 200 words. Short letters will be given preference. All letters must bear the name and address of the writer. Occasionally, when there is valid reason, the name may be withheld on publication if the writer requests it.

but no one had spoken to him in weeks. He became very lonely, and at last went to the country's wise man to ask his advice.

After listening to him patiently for a long while, the wise man said:

"Why are you surprised about what happened? Don't you realize that whenever people become convinced that they cannot associate with you without hurting you, they will avoid you? If one end of the see-saw goes up, the other end must come down."

When are we going to take "race relations" out of the hands of the stupid?

C. E. PURCELL.

Lithonia.

'Older People Superstitious'

The Editors: The contempt in which the world's aged men and women often are held today is deserved, for the aged should be the receptacles of the race's wisdom but today's aged mainly are merely superstitious.

National and racial conceit never are more than superstitions.

mies and corruption and extravagance in government. These are far more important to the people of Georgia and the nation than the price of a quart of milk, which is probably the lowest cost food commodity on the market today. A tax reduction would leave the consumer with more dollars with which to buy milk.

E. M. THORNE.

Millen.

✓ ✓ ✓

'Why Accommodate Rabble-Rousers?'

The Editors: I have just read a story about the plans of the District of Columbia government to accommodate the rabble-rousers, who have vowed to descend on that city, which belongs to all the American people, on Aug. 28.

Their demonstrations are about as "nonviolent" as a nest of rattlesnakes.

Any demonstrations which breed violence are violent, and should be suppressed before they begin. The idea of using the taxpayers' money to make these troublemakers comfortable is thoroughly reprehensible.

If they faint because of their emotional antics, or suffer from lack of food, water and toilet facilities, so much the better. It might teach them a lesson.

If I were driving a car and they threw themselves in front of it, I would run right over them.

MARY HAMMOND.

Atlanta.

✓ ✓ ✓

A New Fable From Lithonia:

The Editors: Once upon a time in the country of "Y" there lived a man who found himself continually being "mistreated" by his neighbors. He made up his mind that he was going to get his "rights," and he found some people who had sympathy for his plight.

At first he was rather surprised at the ease with which he triumphed over his "enemies." Many ministers supported his fight for "fair treatment," and many newspaper editors made of him a "cause celebre." Things seemed to be going his way. He thought he "had it made."

After a time, however, he began to realize that his neighbors were avoiding him. He could find no particular cause for complaint. No one had abused him in several weeks, "race relations" out of the hands of the stupid?

C. E. PURCELL.

Lithonia.

✓ ✓ ✓

'Older People Superstitious'

The Editors: The contempt in which the world's aged men and women often are held today is deserved, for the aged should be the receptacles of the race's wisdom but today's aged mainly are merely superstitious.

National and racial conceit never are more than superstitions.

The world's national leaders today, in their national conceits and international ill-will, by which they justify military conscription and armaments, should be viewed as the very embodiment of superstition — fully as blind as their ancient fore-forebears, the mumbo-jumbo medicine men of old, sacrificing their youth in egoistic orgies.

DERWOOD M. DUDLEY.

Atlanta.

✓ ✓ ✓

He Sees Another 'Lunatic Fringe'

The Editors: We have noticed for a long time that you always refer to the John Birch Society, the Citizens Council and similar organizations as "the lunatic fringe and the crackpots" while you speak of the NAACP, the Urban League, CORE and the Southern Regional Council in the most complimentary terms.

In The Atlanta Journal of August 7, you carried a United Press International article entitled "Negro Marshall Plan Eyed," which stated that the Urban League conceived the idea for the government to spend $10 billion over a period of 10 years to close the gap between the Negro and the white man by providing the Negro with superior schools and teachers over that of the whites and giving him preference in education, job training and employment opportunities, and that Whitney Young Jr., executive secretary of the Urban League, was in a day-long high-level conference at the White House discussing the proposal.

Young said that equality wasn't enough, we must go beyond that. The Urban League is to manage the program. We will leave it to your readers to decide who are the "lunatic fringe and the crackpots."

G. M. ANDERSON.

Cedartown.

GREENSBORO, N.C.
RECORD
D. 31,743

AUG 20 1963

Prejudice's Cost To South Called Very Expensive

BY HUGH PAGE
Record Staff Writer

Prejudice takes a toll from the majority as well as from a victimized minority, delegates to the Continental Conference of Liberal Religious Youth were told today in a panel discussion constituting the daily "theme address" of their sessions at Guilford College.

Dr. Henry Clark, representing the Southern Regional Council, Atlanta, told the 186 teen-agers attending sessions of the Universalist-Unitarian young peoples' organization that white people have realized economical, psychological and political gains from segregation, but they have been bought at "an awful cost."

"Booker T. Washington said the only way you can keep a man in the ditch is to stay there with him, and that is what has happened in the South," Dr. Clark said.

The cost, economically, he said, has been terrific.

"Racial prejudice has been very important in keeping unions out of the South and preventing workers from getting their fair share of profits from industry," he said.

He cited other ways in which he said racial prejudice has cost the South.

Appearing with Dr. Clark in the discussion of "Prejudice As It Affects the Minority and the Majority" were M. Carl Holman, information officer of the Civil Rights Commission, Washington, and Rabbi Joseph Asher of Temple Emanuel, Greensboro.

Holman said that progress has been made in the realm of civil rights, but the Negro is still the victim of discrimination in schools, housing, politics and other fields.

"The gap in the employment picture is widening," he said. "Those people throwing themselves down in front of bulldozers in New York and Philadelphia are just expressing a frustration."

Although restrictive covenants have been outlawed in housing, he said, the Negro finds himself the victim of "gentlemen's agreements."

The Negro also still finds two codes of justice in many courts, one for the whites and one for himself, Holman said, and subterfuges are used to keep him from voting.

He said racial prejudice is not a one-way street. The Negro's experiences have taught him to distrust white people—even to the extent that many have stock answers for questions about race relations which are contrary to their true feeling.

Rabbi Asher said that Jew of today has less difficulty with prejudice than he had a few years ago, but many of the discriminatory acts suffered by the Negro have been suffered by his race.

"All minorities share certain experiences," he said. "If a Catholic were here, he probably would tell of some of the same experiences. He said he is concerned lest the diminishing prejudice have a detrimental effect in challenging the Jew to excellence. The LRY board of trustees was scheduled to elect new officers at a meeting this afternoon.

Justin J. Finger of Atlanta, Southern counsel for the Anti-Defamation League, told the young people last night that the Ku Klux Klan "has gone ivy league."

Finger spoke at a session closed to the public so that his audience would have greater freedom in a question and answer period.

Theme of the meeting is "Prejudice as It Affects the Minority."

Although Finger spoke at a closed session, he discussed his views freely for the press before the meeting.

"There has been a Ku Klux Klan resurgence, mainly in Alabama and Georgia," he said. "There is an intense recruiting drive going on now. What concerns us most is that a higher cut of people, a better class, is attending the Klan meetings now. I don't mean to imply that all better class people are joining the Klan, but there are more than used to be."

The topic of last night's session was the growth of anti-Semitism in the South. Finger said that anti-Semitism "is not too prevalent" in the area and what there is of it comes mostly from belief that movements to give Negroes civil rights is "a Communist-Jewish plot to mongrelize the races."

The Evening Gazette
WORCESTER, MASS.
D. 93,580

AUG 2 0 1963

A voter registration campaign in Atlanta, Ga.

More Negroes Are Registering to Vote

By Relman Morin

Of the Associated Press

TUSKEGEE, Ala. — The Negro woman says she is 50 years old and wants to register to vote. She doesn't know the procedure, never having done it.

In the offices of the Tuskegee Civic Association, a Negro organization, they give her a sample copy of the Alabama registration form. Slowly studying it line by line. she fills in the form. A TCA official finds some minor errors but otherwise, he says the papers are in order. He tells her where, and on which days she can file a real application. If it is accepted, she will be a registered voter.

A reporter questions her. She says simply:

"I just want to become a citizen of our country. Being registered will make me a full citizen."

Widespread Campaign

This scene—with its immense potentialities for the Negro movement—is being re-enacted in hundreds of cities in the South today.

It is the result of the voter-registration drive.

Throughout the South, Negro organizations are working to register more of their people thousands of men and women who never voted before. As the number grows, the political leverage of the Negro increases. Here potentially, is a powerful weapon in his fight against segregation.

The drive moves through many channels.

The woman in Tuskegee may have decided to try to register after hearing a constantly-repeated radio appeal attending a meeting, or simply receiving a handbill.

Provide Help

Elsewhere Negro workers canvass a residential district on registration days, ringing doorbells. If the housewife isn't registered they urge her to go to the courthouse immediately. If she has no transportation, they provide it. If she says she can't leave her children they offer to baby-sit.

Or they station themselves in municipal buildings. A Negro comes in for, say a driver's license. They ask whether he is registered. If not, they try to persuade him to do so there and then.

Another device is the "voter clinic." This is a meeting in which Negro instructors show would-be applicants the technicalities of registering, how to correctly fill out the forms. In Tuskegee alone during the month of June, there were 19 such "clinics."

And there is the famous Alabama mule. He walks through the streets of Huntsville, carrying a sandwich billboard. The sign reads, "I'm not registered because I'm a mule. What's your excuse?"

The Goal

Speaking of the voter registration drivers, Bishop George W. Baber of the African Methodist Episcopal Church said:

"The objectives of the campaign would be accomplished substantially by registering and voting every single, eligible voter within sight or hearing of our membership. Our goal is a minimum of two million new Negro voters North and South."

The movement is steady and seems to be gaining momentum. What are the results?

Exact figures for the South as a whole are not complete. However, the Department of Justice and the Southern Regional Council's "voter education project" pinpoint the changes in some specific areas.

In Tennessee's Haywood and Fayette Counties a Justice Department official said, Negro registration has jumped from 150 to about 5,000 in five years.

Bullock County, Alabama, had four Negro voters on the rolls in 1961, he said. Now the figure is 1,341. In the city of Montgomery, the rate of registration of Negroes used to be about 200 a year. Now it is about 200 per month he said.

Statistics on 11 Southern states, compiled by the Southern Regional Council, indicate that about one-fourth of the Negroes of voting age are registered. The figures show a total of 5,045,000 of whom 1,344,000 are registered. Wiley Branton, an SRC executive said the figures are incomplete, some counties being as yet untabulated.

Comparable figures for the white voting population in these states show 17,539,000, of whom 10,566,000 are registered.

How to Block Them

Especially in areas where Negroes outnumber the whites—sometimes by as much as five to one — many devices have been used to keep political power in the hands of the whites.

Registration boards met irregularly and at widely-spaced intervals. They worked slowly, and then quit for the day while Negroes were still waiting in line to file applications. Or they rejected applications on technical grounds.

For example, on March 17, 1961, after a long legal battle a federal court in Alabama ruled on a lawsuit involving Macon County. The judge wrote in his memorandum that:

"18 applicants, more than half of whom had college or advanced degrees were rejected for such inconsequential, formal technical mistakes."

He ordered the board to register 64 Negroes and to give priority attention to 400 applicants on the waiting list.

Similarly, in testimony before the House Judiciary Committee, Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy said:

"In one county Negroes have been required to copy and interpret long, archaic sections of the state constitution and then have been rejected for omissions of punctuation. Whites, meanwhile have been asked to copy such simply provisions as 'There shall be no imprisonment for debt.' "

Mississippi's Gov. Ross Barnett, ascribed the small number of registered Negroes in his state to other causes. In a copyrighted interview with U.S. News and World Report" he said:

"The primary reasons for the fewer Negro voters include illiteracy, apathy and the law requiring payment of a poll tax. So many Negroes are not qualified to vote."

As to literacy qualifications for registering, he said:

"They have to be able to read and understand and interpret a section of the constitution of the state of Mississippi. We don't believe in having ignorant people elect our officials."

As Negro voting strength increases, what are the political implications for a candidate for public office in the South.

There have been indications already—although it is difficult to say with certainty—that the Negro vote tipped the balance in certain elections. Some residents of Birmingham, Ala.; for example say Negro ballots ousted T. Eugene (Bull) Connor from the city government. Others are not so sure.

'The Best Qualified'

In any case, the thousands of new Negro votes can be expected today to go to the man with "moderate" views on segregation and against the candidate running on a program of strict "white supremacy." In a close election this could spell the difference.

In Tuskegee, Ala. Negro leaders say they already outnumber the whites in registered voters. Thus, theoretically, they could elect a mayor and an entire city government. But William P Mitchell executive secretary of the Tuskegee Civic Association, says:

"We would discourage an all-Negro slate. We don't want Negro domination and we have preached that for years.

"We just want to vote for the best qualified man."

DURHAM, N.C.
HERALD
D. 35,032 S. 41,626

AUG 21 1963

Official Declares Segregation Cost In South 'Awful'

GUILFORD COLLEGE (AP) — A Southern Regional Council official said here Tuesday that segregation has been maintained in the South "at an awful cost."

Dr. Henry Clark told the Continental Congress of Liberal Religious Youth at Guilford College that "Booker T. Washington said the only way you can keep a man in the ditch is to stay there with him. And that is what has happened in the South."

The costs of prejudice have been terrific economically, Dr. Clark said. "Racial prejudice has been very important in keeping unions out of the South and preventing workers from getting their fair share of profits from industry," he told 186 teen-agers at the Universalist - Unitarian Young People's Meeting.

Dr. Clark said, however, that although the costs have been high, the white people have realized some economical, psychological and political gains from segregation.

Dr. Clark made his remarks Tuesday when he appeared on a panel discussion entitled "Prejudice as it affects the minority and majority." Also appearing on the panel were M. Carl Holman, information office of the Civil Rights Commission in Washington, and Rabbi Joseph Asher of Greensboro.

EL DORADO, ARK.
TIMES
D. 10,869 S. 11,609

AUG 21 1963

BRANTON NAMED

LITTLE ROCK (AP) — A New York Comhittee has named Wiley A. Branton of Pine Bluff to coordinate seven national civil rights organizations for the next six months.

The appointment of the Negro attorney was announced by the Committee for Welfare, Education and Legal Defense (WELD). Branton will maintain his position as head of the Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council at Atlanta, Ga.

The Atlanta Journal
"COVERS DIXIE LIKE THE DEW"
D. 259,003

AUG 2 1 1963

WILEY BRANTON

Atlanta Is in Forefront of Quiet But Momentous Civil Rights Move

By PAT WATTERS

AGAINST all the fanfare and fervor of the buildup to a civil rights moment of truth in Washington, a probably more significant development has been taking place this summer in the background. And an Atlantan is in the forefront of it, Wiley A. Branton, a Negro leader strangely unsung, unknown locally, but of the very top echelon nationally.

The nation's seven leading civil rights organizations have, after years of sometimes vicious, always enfeebling internecine competition, temporarily banded together — agreeing to quit disagreeing over means to mutual ends.

This coincides with a new stabilizing force in the underwriting of the civil rights revolution. As described by Reese Cleghorn recently in the New Republic, big-time money and organization, largely through efforts of the Taconic Foundation headed by Stephen R. Currier of New York, are finally coming behind the revolution.

NEW PHASE

Some might say that with the development, the revolution has moved into a final, familiar, uniquely American phase — gilt-edge respectability. No longer, anyhow, should there be the impetus or temptation toward unnecessary extremes (proneness to violence for example) for the sake of fiscal survival.

Mr. Branton of Atlanta has been named to coordinate the activities (including raising $1,500,000 jointly) of the seven civil rights organizations. In the words of one sometimes irreverent Negro leader, this makes him "president of the Negroes in America."

This new move could be the beginning of a long-range unified approach of civil rights organizations, said Mr. Branton . . . Of Atlanta, he said fixed patterns of segregated housing may be the most significant stumbling block to desegregation. This didn't matter as much before all the court orders . . .

A quiet-spoken, deliberate man, Mr. Branton would be the first to disclaim such a title. For him, it will be more work of the same hard kind he has done for a year and a half as coordinator of the Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council. (Another important joint effort of Negro organizations, this project reported 115,000 new voters registered in the South its first year, and 25,000 voters saved from purge lists.)

Mr. Branton will continue both jobs during the six months he has been named to the new one, commuting from here to New York. He brings to it a shrewd and undeluded ability to appraise organizations and individuals, and a demanding control of purse strings.

Mr. Branton came to Atlanta from Little Rock. He was chief counsel in the famous school desegregation suits there. He has served as a civil rights lawyer in other phases of the revolution, has spoken over the nation on the subject, has lived unperturbed through sieges of Arkansas harassment for his activities (a cross was burning on his lawn when the youngest of his six children was brought home from the hospital . . . and yet white court officials presented him a silver tray when he moved), and he has received many honors and awards outside Atlanta.

STARTLING

He startled people earlier this year when in reply to charges he was an outside agitator in Greenwood, Miss., he pointed out he was descended from a pioneer family, a French trader and Indian princess, for whom Greenwood and Leflore County were named. Ensuing publicity brought a joking telegram from his brother, a lawyer in Los Angeles whose clients include Nat King Cole. You had to open your big mouth, it said. Now they probably won't serve me in bars out here. (It's against the law to serve drinks to Indians in California.)

This is the joking approach to a worlds-apart anomaly which as one friend put it, makes Mr. Branton look white among whites, Negro among Negroes. (Quietly and surely with grim humor, he desegregated many staunchly segregationist Atlanta restaurants long before the student drive. Of one, he says, "I stopped eating there because they wouldn't desegregate . . .")

The serious approach is more profound. Mr. Branton's life, with another chapter beginning with this new, vital job, is a large factor in changing American history.

ATLANTA, GA.
WORLD
D. 29,800
PAGE ONE CERTIFIED (N)
AUG 21 1963

Branton To Coordinate Rights Committee Work

The Committee for Welfare, Education and Legal Defense (WELD) today announced that Wiley A. Branton, a leader in the Negro voter registration drive in the South, will coordinate the activities of seven national civil rights agencies over the next six months.

It also announced receipt of a $50,000 grant from the Rockefeller Brothers Fund to assist in achieving, through peaceful means, equal rights for all citizens.

Mr. Branton, one of the nation's highly regarded civil rights attorneys, will work closely with the leadership of all seven agencies to strengthen and coordinate their activities in the field.

WELD is composed of the Educational Fund of the National Council of Negro Women, the N.A.A.C.P. Legal Defense and Educational Fund and the National Urban League. Its Co-chairmen, Stephen R. Currier and Whitney M. Young, Jr., are also Co-Chairmen of the Council for United Civil Rights Leadership, which includes these three tax-exempt organizations and the Congress of Racial Equality, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Southern Christian Leadership Conference and the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee.

In announcing Mr. Branton's appointment, Mr. Young and Mr. Currier said he brings to the coordinated effort a wealth of experience and dedication to the civil rights movement. They commended his willingness to assume a key role in the unity program represented by the Council and WELD while continuing with the vitally important Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council which has been carrying out voter registration campaigns in Southern cities.

(Continued on Page 8, Col. 1)

Branton To

(Continued from Page One)

Mr. Young and Mr. Currier said that WELD and the Council are seeking to raise $1.5 million in joint emergency funds to meet the unexpected costs of the current civil rights crisis. Contributions to WELD, which are tax deductible, may be sent to 10 Columbus Circle, New York 19, N. Y.

It will be Mr. Branton's task to help focus the efforts of the participating organizations, each of which retains full autonomy and continues to pursue their own objective—equal rights—in a variety of ways for maximum effectiveness within the framework of orderly democratic processes to which the organizations are dedicated.

Mr. Branton, a graduate of the University of Arkansas School of Low, has represented, at various times, virtually all of the civil rights organizations comprising the Council. He served as legal counsel for the Little Rock, Arkansas school cases and in a large number of constitutional questions involving freedom riders and equal opportunities matters.

Mr. Branton was born in Pine Bluff, Arkansas, attended local schools, and served for 3½ years in the U. S. Army Far Eastern Theater. He is married to the former Lucille McKee of Memphis, Tennessee, and has six children. Among recent awards he has received are:

C. Francis Stratford Award by National Bar Association, Chicago, 1958.

Outstanding Citizen of the Year Award, Omega Psi Phi Fraternity, Cleveland, Ohio, 1958.

Demonocratic Minority Conference Award, Los Angeles, California, 1959.

Arkansas Conference NAACP Award, for outstanding legal work in the field of civil rights, 1958.

Cited by LIFE Magazine as one of the 100 most important young men and women in the United States, September 14, 1962.

HICKORY, N.C.
RECORD
D. 22,399

AUG 22 1963

Teens Told Costs High For Prejudice

GUILFORD COLLEGE (AP) — A Southern Regional Council official said here Tuesday that segregation had been maintained in the South "at an awful cost."

Dr. Henry Clark of Atlanta told the Continental Congress of Liberal Religious Youth at Guilford College that "Booker T. Washington said the only way you can keep a man in the ditch is to stay there with him. And that is what has happened in the South."

The costs of prejudice have been terrific economically, Clark said. "Racial prejudice has been very important in keeping unions out of the South and preventing workers from getting their fair share of profits from industry."

Clark said that although the costs have been high, the white people have realized some economic, psychological and political gains from segregation.

The conference is being attended by 186 teen-agers.

SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
REGISTER
W. 9,912 (N)

AUG 23 1963

Little Known Foundation Gives Million to Rights Fight

By the Associated Negro Press

NEW YORK—More than $1,000,000 has been quietly pumped into the civil rights fight since 1958 by a young publicity shy son of a distinguished American artist and his wife who is the granddaughter of the powerful Pennsylvania industrialist, Andrew Mellon.

Through their Tactonic Foundation, Stephen R. Currier, who is 32, and his wife, Audrey, have given financial aid to such organizations as the NAACP, the National Urban league, the Southern Regional council and the Potomac Institute, created by them "to eliminate discrimination and advance equal opportunity for all Americans."

Currier was largely responsible for the recent decision of seven predominantly Negro civil rights organizations to establish common fund-raising units to meet the additional financial burden of the great increase in civil rights activities.

Currier is the son of the late Richard Currier, a painter who lived for many years in Europe, and of Mrs. Elizabeth Galt Griscom Currier.

His wife is the former Audrey Bruce, daughter of David K. E. Bruce, United States ambassador to Britain, and Bruce's former wife, Mrs. Alisa Mellon Bruce. Mrs. Currier's mother is the daughter of the late Andrew Mellon, one-time secretary of the treasury.

The Curriers established the foundation because they believed that they, as possessors of wealth and the advantages that went with it, had a deep obligation to the less privileged.

Determined to put their money to the best possible use, they made a thorough study of the field of philanthropy and the work done by other foundations.

They concluded that certain areas, such as higher education, medicine, science and the arts, were already well served financially and decided to concentrate primarily on race relations, child welfare and mental health.

Studies made under the auspices of the foundation or with its financial help then convinced the Curriers that the most serious problem was that of the "deprived" Negro. Of the money they have put into the foundation from year to year, more and more has gone to help solve this problem.

Complete figures on the foundation's grants are not available, but those that are, show that in 1960, $162,000, was devoted to race relations; in 1961, $260,200; and in 1962, $318,500. Already this year the foundation has committed $400,000 to this work.

The total outlay of the fund in 1960 was $347,703; in 1961, $585,477, and in 1962, $605,569.

In addition to race relations, grants have been made for youth and welfare work, for a study of youth unemployment, for mental health and urban problems, and to community and neighborhood organizations.

The Tactonic foundation also has established and supports the Potomac institute in Washington. Its purpose is "to eliminate discrimination and advance equal opportunity for all Americans."

Of the $400,000 already committed this year for race relations work, $125,000 is going to the Southern Regional council for its program to increase Negro voter registration in the South. The Tactonic foundation has already granted $125,000 more for this project.

Approximately $100,000 is for the Potomac institute; $80,000 for the Urban league: $25,000 for the legal defense, and educational fund

GREENVILLE, S.C.
NEWS
D. 82,430 S. 86,866

AUG 22 1963

Segregation's Cost 'Awful'

GUILFORD COLLEGE, N. C. (AP) — A Southern Regional Council official said here Tuesday that segregation has been maintained in the South "at an awful cost."

Dr. Henry Clark told the Continental Congress of Liberal Religious Youth at Guilford College that "Booker T. Washington said the only way you can keep a man in the ditch is to stay there with him. And that is what has happened in the South.

The costs of prejudice have been terrific economically, Dr. Clark said. "Racial prejudice has been very important in keeping unions out of the South and preventing workers from getting their fair share of profits from industry," he told 186 teen-agers at the Universalist-Unitarian young people's meeting.

AUGUSTA, GA.
CHRONICLE
D. 45,160 S. 55,793

AUG 21 1963

Segregation cost is termed high

GUILFORD COLLEGE, N. N. (AP)—A Southern Regional Council official said here Tuesday that segregation has been maintained in the south "at an awful cost."

Dr. Henry Clark of Atlanta, told the continental congress of liberal religious youth at Guilford College that the costs of prejudice have been terrific economically.

Dr. Clark said, however, that although the costs have been high, the white people have realized some economical, psychological and political gains from segregation.

has problems, and to community and neighborhood organizations.

The Tactonic foundation also has established and supports the Potomac institute in Washington. Its purpose is "to eliminate discrimination and advance equal opportunity for all Americans."

Of the $400,000 already committed this year for race relations work, $125,000 is going to the Southern Regional council for its program to increase Negro voter registration in the South. The Tactonic foundation has already granted $125,000 more for this project.

Approximately $100,000 is for the Potomac institute; $80,000 for the Urban league; $25,000 for the legal defense, and educational fund of the NAACP, and the remaining $70,000 for what was described as "miscellaneous projects."

Currier's work with Negro civil rights organizations convinced him that greater co-ordination was needed in their fund-raising activities. Largely through his efforts, seven of them formed for this purpose the Council for Civil Rights Leadership and the Committee for Welfare, Education and Legal Defense.

He arranged a breakfast at the Hotel Carlyle on June 19 at which leaders of the seven organizations explained their needs to 96 corporation and foundation leaders. This meeting produced nearly $800,000 for the council.

Currier is president of the foundation and also of Currier and company, which manages the family's business interests.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
LOUISIANA WEEKLY (N)
W. 19,532

AUG 24 1963

Foundation Grants $1 Million To Civil Rights Fight In Four Years

NEW YORK (ANP) -- More than $1,000,000 has been quietly pumped into the civil rights fight since 1958 by a young publicity shy son of a distinguished American artist and his wife who is the granddaughter of the powerful Pennsylvania industrialist, Andrew Mellon.

Through their Taconic Foundation, Stephen R. Currier, who is 32 and his wife, Audrey, have given financial aid to such organizations as the NAACP, The National Urban League, the Southern Regional Council and the Potomac Institute, created by them "to eliminate discrimination and advance equal opportunity for all Americans."

Currier was largely responsible for the recent decision of seven predominantly Negro civil rights organizations to establish common fund-raising units to meet the additional financial burden of the great increase in civil rights activities.

Currier, is the son of the late Richard Currier, a painter who lived for many years in Europe, and of Mrs. Elizabeth Galt Griscom Currier.

His wife is the former Audrey Bruce, daughter of David K. E. Bruce, United States Ambassador to Britain, and Bruce's former wife, Mrs. Alisa Mellon Bruce. Mrs. Currier's mother is the daughter of the late Andrew Mellon, one-time Secretary of the Treasury.

The Curriers established the foundation because they believed that they, as possessors of wealth and the advantages that went with it, had a deep obligation to the less privileged.

Determined to put their money to the best possible use, they made a thorough study of the field of philantrophy and the work done by other foundations.

They concluded that certain areas, such as higher education, medicine, science and the arts, were already well served financially and decided to concentrate primarily on race relations, child welfare and mental health.

Studies made under the auspices of the foundation or with its financial help then convinced the Curriers that the most serious problem was that of the "deprived" Negro. Of the money they have put into the foundation from year to year, more and more has gone to help solve this problem.

Complete figures on the foundation's grants are not available, but those that are show that in 1960, $162,000 was devoted to race relations, in 1961, $260,200, and in 1962, $318,500. Already this year the foundation has committed $400,000 to this work.

The total outlay of the fund in 1960 was $347,703; in 1961, $585,477, and in 1962, $695,569.

In addition to race relations, grants have been made for youth and welfare work, for a study of youth unemployment, for mental health and urban problems, and to community and neighborhood organizations.

ATLANTA, GA. PAGE ONE CERTIFIED
WORLD (N)
D. 29,800
AUG 25 1963

Forrester B. Washington Dies After Long Illness

NEW YORK CITY — Dr. Forrester B. Washington, distinguished sociologist and educator, died here Saturday morning after an extended illness. He resided at 200 West 190th Street.

Funeral services will be held Tuesday, at Detroit, Michigan.

DR. FORRESTER WASHINGTON

A native of Salem, Mass., he received baccalaureate degrees from Tufts College, Medford, Mass., and Columbia University, New York City. He did graduate work at Harvard University and was awarded an honorary LL. D., by Morehouse College.

Dr. Washington started his long career as a social worker and educator as executive director of the Detroit Urban League in 1916. He held other important positions, including supervisor Dept of Labor; director research bureau, Detroit Associated Charities; and executive secretary, Armstrong Association, Philadelphia.

DIRECTOR A. U. SCHOOL OF SOCIAL WORK 28 YEARS

He served as director of the Atlanta University School of Social Work, Atlanta, Ga., for 28 years, from 1927 until he retired in 1955. Immediately after leaving Atlanta University, he worked for the Harmon Foundation on African Studies.

Before his retirement, Dr. Washington held membership in numerous professional organizations and contributed articles to the leading journals and periodicals in the field of Social Work. He was a member of the Southern Regional Council, the Fulton County Citizens Democratic Club; Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity and was former president of the Atlanta Chapter of the NAACP.

It is the request of the family

(Continued on Page 4, Col. 4)

Forrester Washington

(Continued from Page One)

that instead of sending flowers, his friends will send contributions to the Forrest B. Washington Scholarship Loan Fund at Atlanta University. This fund was set up to aid students desirous of training for careers in the field of Social Work.

Immediate survivors include his wife, Mrs. Sophronia J. Washington; a daughter, Mrs. Dorothy Jackson, Detroit, Mich.; two brothers, Lawrence and Ernest Washington, Boston, Mass.; a grandson, Ronald Jackson, a student at Morehouse College; and two nephews, Lawrence M. Washington, Atlanta; and Dr. John W. Washington, Dayton, Ohio.

WALL STREET JOURNAL.
CLEVELAND, OHIO
D. 207,360 PAGE ONE CERTIFIED
AUG 27 1963

A Shift in Strategy

Mass Demonstrations Begin to Lose Favor With Integration Forces

Especially in Dixie, Negroes Turn More to Boycotts and Drives to Register Voters

Activists Soon to Be in School

By WILLIAM E. BLUNDELL
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

With the nation's attention riveted on tomorrow's march on Washington, who would claim the technique of public demonstrations, employed more than 1,000 times this summer, is losing favor with militant Negro rights organizations?

Many Negro leaders would—and do—make this claim, especially Negro leaders in the South. They reveal a significant shift in the strategy of civil rights groups.

"This is the watchword now: Stay out of jail, keep your money in your pockets and register every voter you can get your hands on," says Charles Evers, who has taken over as Mississippi field secretary for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People following the murder of his brother, Medgar, this summer.

What Mr. Evers is calling for are more intensive boycotts and stepped up voter registration drives in place of street demonstrations which put hundreds of Negroes into jail.

"Negroes are just beginning to realize that big demonstrations of the civil disobedience variety are not a magic formula," says Paul Anthony, field director of the Southern Regional Council, a respected bi-racial human rights group. "Demonstrations have been and will continue to be useful where they can trigger community action. But in some communities, the trigger is pulled but the gun doesn't go off. White resistance just solidifies."

Mixed Results

There's no doubt the demonstrations have been a costly and wearing proposition to civil rights advocates in some Southern cities. While the massive demonstration technique did bring dramatic results in such cities as Birmingham and Nashville, it has been an abject failure in other cities such as Jackson.

In Dallas, Clarence Laws, Southwest Regional Secretary for the NAACP, puts it this way: "We're at a point now where the demonstration gains are being consolidated and new techniques devised. We know a pitcher can't go on winning games with nothing but a fast ball," he says.

It's no accident that Negro strategy is being overhauled just as schools around the country prepare to open their doors. With the children back in their classrooms, Negro leaders realize they won't be able to muster the huge crowds they've been able to call into the streets during the summer vacation. High school—and often grade school—youth has formed the bulk of the Negro civil rights battalions that have battered at segregation's walls the past few months. White officials in Savannah, Ga., site of big demonstrations in June and July, estimate that "75% to 80%" of the 2,000 demonstrators they've had to deal with were juveniles.

A Shift in Strategy: Demonstrations Begin to Lose Integrationists' Favor

Continued From First Page

year," says Mr. Page, who recently motored to Atlanta to buy an air conditioner for his home.

The boycott appears to be having an economic impact. Retail sales in Dougherty County where Albany is located, after rising briskly in 1962, have slumped this year since the boycott went into effect. In the three months ended June 30, sales were off $438,000 from the $34,262,766 rung up in the 1962 period. In contrast, Colquitt County which embraces Moultrie posted a gain of $1,057,499 to bring sales to $12,359,197 in the same period. Sales in the state, as a whole, were also up in the quarter.

Negro leaders elsewhere are turning to the boycott as a primary weapon. "We're finding that a lot of people don't begin to feel any pangs of conscience until the cash register stops ringing," says the NAACP's Mr. Laws.

In strife-torn Danville where demonstrations have lagged, leaders have turned to an extensive boycott. "It's obvious the boycott can be the most effective weapon of all," says Rev. Lendell Chase, head of the Danville Christian Progressive Association. His group has had a boycott in effect since May, and now Rev. Chase is extending it to the entire county. Furthermore, he's asking Negro tobacco farmers not to sell their product in Danville markets; instead, they're to truck it out of the county. Yesterday, Danville's public schools were desegregated. Seven Negro children attended classes along with whites.

Civil rights leaders in Plaquemine, La., are now turning to a mass boycott of downtown stores, following unsuccessful demonstrations which occured last week. Plaquemine officials effectively throttled the demonstrations by jailing 200 demonstrators, among them James Farmer, National Director of the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE). Also, the town obtained a Federal court injunction against further mass marches and rallies.

But now Negro leaders see the boycott as a weapon to tighten the economic screws on the community. They are laying plans for bus convoys to roll into Baton Rouge, a dozen or so miles away, where Negroes from Plaquemine will do their shopping, if the leadership prevails.

Pressing Economic Warfare

Negroes in other southern towns are pressing economic war. In Sumter, S.C., Negroes are being transported to Charlotte to shop. A boycott is also in effect in Charleston. In these and other places, Negroes have been heartened by successful boycott and picketing in such spots as New Orleans, where an Easter boycott was followed by the hiring of Negro sales personnel in downtown stores; and in Dallas, where drug stores were forced to take on Negro clerks. Possible future pressure points, particularly aimed at upgrading of job opportunities: Houston, Shreveport, La., Hot Springs, Ark. In Jackson, too, Negroes plan to redouble boycott efforts that began earlier this year.

Elsewhere, Negroes are also driving hard on voter registration. In some cases, these drives are being accompanied by experiments in self improvement. In Spartanburg, S.C., CORE is sponsoring community workshops in which Negro adults are taught to read and write. They're also urged to form neighborhood improvement associations which would help insure that trash is put out promptly and houses painted. "We're trying to prepare them for a fuller citizenship," says Frank Robinson, CORE field secretary, who believes such action will help answer the charge from some whites that Negroes are not responsible citizens.

Predictably, squabbles over strategy have opened deep rifts between Negro factions in some towns. In Savannah, the NAACP refused to support mass marches held downtown in July by the Chatham County Crusade for Voters (CCC), a former NAACP voter-registration arm that separated from the parent group and was converted into a direct action organization. The NAACP, dismayed at what it considered questionable elements attracted by the CCC, says its youth leaders were already negotiating with businessmen over admission to restaurants, bowling alleys, and other facilities when the demonstrations erupted.

A Shaky Alliance

Both sides overtly have patched their differences, and businessmen have agreed to a desegregation plan effective Oct. 1. But the Negro alliance is shaky and businessmen fear squabbles among rival Negro groups could touch off new troubles.

It appears Negroes will need all the solidarity they can muster to combat the growing skill shown by many of the so-called "white power structures" with which they'll have to deal. In some cities, such as Shreveport and Danville, adult civil rights leaders have been charged with contributing to the delinquency of minors after demonstrations by Negro youths; Jackson and Danville, among others, have obtained injunctions against demonstrating. Savannah officials have robbed the CCC of its leadership by holding leaders in jail for extended periods on peace warrants. In other places, bail is set at high levels and cash instead of property is required for bond.

The determination of some white authorities to crush demonstrations and other direct action movements is exemplified by the city of Jackson. The Mississippi capital in June alone spent an extra $150,000 on its law enforcement program to meet the Negro demonstration efforts. Much of it went to overtime pay for policemen but $50,000 went for additional jail facilities. "We don't regret a penny of it," says Mayor Allen C. Thompson.

While this summer's rash of public demonstrations (the Justice Department counts 1,122 since it began tallying them on May 20) will undoubtedly taper off, no one expects they'll stop completely. There's a feeling they've been more successful in the North than in the South, for instance, and any decline there would be less drastic than in Dixie. Some Negro leaders also claim that "spontaneous" demonstrations are apt to break out when newly-militant Negroes become aroused over some situation—such as Congressional refusal to pass a strong civil rights law.

WALL STREET JOURNAL.
DALLAS, TEXAS
D. 71,247
PAGE ONE
CERTIFIED
AUG 2 7 1963

A Shift in Strategy

Mass Demonstrations Begin to Lose Favor With Integration Forces

Especially in Dixie, Negroes Turn More to Boycotts and Drives to Register Voters

Activists Soon to Be in School

By WILLIAM E. BLUNDELL
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

With the nation's attention riveted on tomorrow's march on Washington, who would claim the technique of public demonstrations, employed more than 1,000 times this summer, is losing favor with militant Negro rights organizations?

Many Negro leaders would—and do—make this claim, especially Negro leaders in the South. They reveal a significant shift in the strategy of civil rights groups.

"This is the watchword now: Stay out of jail, keep your money in your pockets and register every voter you can get your hands on," says Charles Evers, who has taken over as Mississippi field secretary for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People following the murder of his brother, Medgar, this summer.

What Mr. Evers is calling for are more intensive boycotts and stepped up voter registration drives in place of street demonstrations which put hundreds of Negroes into jail.

"Negroes are just beginning to realize that big demonstrations of the civil disobedience variety are not a magic formula," says Paul Anthony, field director of the Southern Regional Council, a respected bi-racial human rights group. "Demonstrations have been and will continue to be useful where they can trigger community action. But in some communities, the trigger is pulled but the gun doesn't go off. White resistance just solidifies."

Mixed Results

There's no doubt the demonstrations have been a costly and wearing proposition to civil rights advocates in some Southern cities. While the massive demonstration technique did bring dramatic results in such cities as Birmingham and Nashville, it has been an abject failure in other cities such as Jackson.

In Dallas, Clarence Laws, Southwest Regional Secretary for the NAACP, puts it this way: "We're at a point now where the demonstration gains are being consolidated and new techniques devised. We know a pitcher can't go on winning games with nothing but a fast ball," he says.

It's no accident that Negro strategy is being overhauled just as schools around the country prepare to open their doors. With the children back in their classrooms, Negro leaders realize they won't be able to muster the huge crowds they've been able to call into the streets

Mixed Results

There's no doubt the demonstrations have been a costly and wearing proposition to civil rights advocates in some Southern cities. While the massive demonstration technique did bring dramatic results in such cities as Birmingham and Nashville, it has been an abject failure in other cities such as Jackson.

In Dallas, Clarence Laws, Southwest Regional Secretary for the NAACP, puts it this way: "We're at a point now where the demonstration gains are being consolidated and new techniques devised. We know a pitcher can't go on winning games with nothing but a fast ball," he says.

It's no accident that Negro strategy is being overhauled just as schools around the country prepare to open their doors. With the children back in their classrooms, Negro leaders realize they won't be able to muster the huge crowds they've been able to call into the streets during the summer vacation. High school—and often grade school—youth has formed the bulk of the Negro civil rights battalions that have battered at segregation's walls the past few months. White officials in Savannah, Ga., site of big demonstrations in June and July, estimate that "75% to 80%" of the 2,000 demonstrators they've had to deal with were juveniles.

Negroes are well aware that when school opens their children will be vulnerable to disciplinary action by school officials if they miss school as a result of their demonstrating. Says Mr. Evers: "We simply can't afford to take the chance of our children getting expelled. We remember Birmingham."

In that city, 1,081 school children were suspended or expelled for participating in riots in May. Though a Federal court overturned the school board ruling on a technicality, sources close to the Birmingham school board indicate youthful demonstrators will meet the same reception if they try again.

An Economic Argument

Southern school boards advance an economic argument for taking a tough stand on truancy caused by demonstrations: "We intend to be very intolerant of truancy of this nature," promises Savannah School Board President Dr. Darnell Brawner. "With more than half our operating revenues coming from the state on the basis of average daily attendance, we just can't afford to look the other way."

All this, of course, doesn't mean that young Negroes will be taken out of the picture entirely when school opens. Negro leaders note that nights and weekends will still be available for demonstrations. Also, militant Negro college students trooping back to school will doubtless form the core of many demonstrations in towns near their schools. Nevertheless, the opening of school signals the death knell for massive marches in many communities.

Besides being influenced by school reopenings, Negro strategists are reacting to the lack of success they've had with demonstrations in such Southern cities as Jackson and Albany, Ga. Demonstrations having failed to gain the objective in these towns, Negroes are switching to more subtle methods which some refer to as "guerrilla warfare."

Consider Albany, a little southwestern Georgia trade center. Big demonstrations there in 1961 and last year have failed completely to budge an adamant city government. Quick police action has consistently broken up Negro demonstration efforts and, as a result, there hasn't been a major demonstration all this year, Negro and white leaders report.

"We had to switch strategy after the demonstrations had no tangible effect," says M. S. Page, executive secretary of the Albany movement. "And frankly, many of our adult Negroes simply don't have the backbone for it; they've been frightened off. So now we're waging guerrilla warfare, hanging on with bulldog tenacity."

Mass Boycott

The Albany Negroes have turned to a mass boycott. Since it began early this year, Negroes drive out of town to buy in nearby Moultrie, in Columbus, 85 miles away and even in Atlanta 170 miles away. Some go in a car pool arranged by the movement. "I figure I've spent about $2,000 out of town this year," says Mr. Page, who recently motored

Please Turn to Page 6, Column 2

Success of a Fake: Simulated Furs Attract Fast-Growing Demand

Continued From First Page

dresses, shifts, hats, purses, slacks, shoes and parkas are among items for fall that are made of simulated fur. Cabana Beachwear Co. even is bringing out a $30 tiger fabric bathing suit.

Although fake furs are going mainly into women's garments at this time, makers of children's clothing are using them increasingly. Phony pony for children's coats and parkas is a popular item. And Dave Paris, president of Steffi Fashions, Inc., says he is making coats for girls from age three up in eight patterns, including calf and civet cat, and is far behind in getting out his orders.

Makers of women's coats report a similar prosperity. Morton Metzger, general manager of Morris Metzger & Sons, which produces the Sportown line of coats, says "this is the biggest year since we've been in business." Herbert Haar, Jr., secretary-treasurer of Fairmoor Coat & Suit Corp., says sales are running 90% ahead of a year ago and would be up considerably more if he could get more deliveries of the fake fur fabrics.

Steffi Fashions' Mr. Paris declares that the boom in fake furs has "really kicked the woolen business in the teeth." And makers of wool coating fabrics concede they have suffered. "Fake fur unquestionably has cut into our business," says one manufacturer. "The only question is how long the fake fur fad will last."

Furriers, on the other hand, say they have noticed no ill effects. Few women who buy coats of fake fur could be regarded as potential buyers of real fur coats, they contend.

WALL STREET JOURNAL.
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 101,905

AUG 27 1963

A Shift in Strategy

Mass Demonstrations Begin to Lose Favor With Integration Forces

Especially in Dixie, Negroes Turn More to Boycotts and Drives to Register Voters

Activists Soon to Be in School

By WILLIAM E. BLUNDELL
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

With the nation's attention riveted on tomorrow's march on Washington, who would claim the technique of public demonstrations, employed more than 1,000 times this summer, is losing favor with militant Negro rights organizations?

Many Negro leaders would—and do—make this claim, especially Negro leaders in the South. They reveal a significant shift in the strategy of civil rights groups.

"This is the watchword now: Stay out of jail, keep your money in your pockets and register every voter you can get your hands on," says Charles Evers, who has taken over as Mississippi field secretary for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People following the murder of his brother, Medgar, this summer.

What Mr. Evers is calling for are more intensive boycotts and stepped up voter registration drives in place of street demonstrations which put hundreds of Negroes into jail.

"Negroes are just beginning to realize that big demonstrations of the civil disobedience variety are not a magic formula," says Paul Anthony, field director of the Southern Regional Council, a respected biracial human rights group. "Demonstrations have been and will continue to be useful where they can trigger community action. But in some communities, the trigger is pulled but the gun doesn't go off. White resistance just solidifies."

Mixed Results

There's no doubt the demonstrations have been a costly and wearing proposition to civil rights advocates in some Southern cities. While the massive demonstration technique did bring dramatic results in such cities as Birmingham and Nashville, it has been an abject failure in other cities such as Jackson.

In Dallas, Clarence Laws, Southwest Regional Secretary for the NAACP, puts it this way: "We're at a point now where the demonstration gains are being consolidated and new techniques devised. We know a pitcher can't go on winning games with nothing but a fast ball," he says.

It's no accident that Negro strategy is being overhauled just as schools around the country prepare to open their doors. With the children back in their classrooms, Negro leaders realize they won't be able to muster the huge and Nashville, it has been an abject failure in other cities such as Jackson.

In Dallas, Clarence Laws, Southwest Regional Secretary for the NAACP, puts it this way: "We're at a point now where the demonstration gains are being consolidated and new techniques devised. We know a pitcher can't go on winning games with nothing but a fast ball," he says.

It's no accident that Negro strategy is being overhauled just as schools around the country prepare to open their doors. With the children back in their classrooms, Negro leaders realize they won't be able to muster the huge crowds they've been able to call into the streets during the summer vacation. High school—and often grade school—youth has formed the bulk of the Negro civil rights battalions that have battered at segregation's walls the past few months. White officials in Savannah, Ga., site of big demonstrations in June and July, estimate that "75% to 80%" of the 2,000 demonstrators they've had to deal with were juveniles.

Negroes are well aware that when school opens their children will be vulnerable to disciplinary action by school officials if they miss school as a result of their demonstrating. Says Mr. Evers: "We simply can't afford to take the chance of our children getting expelled. We remember Birmingham."

In that city, 1,081 school children were suspended or expelled for participating in riots in May. Though a Federal court overturned the school board ruling on a technicality, sources close to the Birmingham school board indicate youthful demonstrators will meet the same reception if they try again.

An Economic Argument

Southern school boards advance an economic argument for taking a tough stand on truancy caused by demonstrations: "We intend to be very intolerant of truancy of this nature," promises Savannah School Board President Dr. Darnell Brawner. "With more than half our operating revenues coming from the state on the basis of average daily attendance, we just can't afford to look the other way."

All this, of course, doesn't mean that young Negroes will be taken out of the picture entirely when school opens. Negro leaders note that nights and weekends will still be available for demonstrations. Also, militant Negro college students trooping back to school will doubtless form the core of many demonstrations in towns near their schools. Nevertheless, the opening of school signals the death knell for massive marches in many communities.

Besides being influenced by school reopenings, Negro strategists are reacting to the lack of success they've had with demonstrations in such southern cities as Jackson, Albany, Ga. Demonstrations having failed to gain the objective in these towns, Negroes are switching to more subtle methods which some refer to as "guerrilla warfare."

Consider Albany, a little southwestern Georgia trade center. Big demonstrations there in 1961 and last year have failed completely to budge an adamant city government. Quick police action has consistently broken up Negro demonstration efforts and, as a result, there hasn't been a major demonstration all this year, Negro and white leaders report.

"We had to switch strategy after the demonstrations had no tangible effect," says M. S. Page, executive secretary of the Albany movement. "And frankly, many of our adult Negroes simply don't have the backbone for it; they've been frightened off. So now we're waging guerrilla warfare, hanging on with bulldog tenacity."

The Albany Negroes have turned to a mass boycott. Since it began early this year, Negroes drive out of town to buy in nearby Moultrie, in Columbus, 85 miles away and even in Atlanta 170 miles away. Some go in a car pool arranged by the movement. "I figure I've spent about $2,000 out of town this year," says Mr. Page, who recently motored

Please Turn to Page 8, Column 2

A Shift in Strategy: Demonstrations Begin to Lose Integrationists' Favor

Continued From First Page

to Atlanta to buy an air conditioner for his home.

The boycott appears to be having an economic impact. Retail sales in Dougherty County, where Albany is located, after rising briskly in 1962, have slumped this year since the boycott went into effect. In the three months ended June 30, sales were off $438,000 from the $34,262,766 rung up in the 1962 period. In contrast, Colquitt County which embraces Moultrie posted a gain of $1,057,499 to bring sales to $12,359,197 in the same period. Sales in the state, as a whole, were also up in the quarter.

Negro leaders elsewhere are turning to the boycott as a primary weapon. "We're finding that a lot of people don't begin to feel any pangs of conscience until the cash register stops ringing," says the NAACP's Mr. Laws.

In strife-torn Danville where demonstrations have flagged, leaders have turned to an extensive boycott. "It's obvious the boycott can be the most effective weapon of all," says Rev. Lendel Chase, head of the Danville Christian Progressive Association. His group has had a boycott in effect since May, and now Rev. Chase is extending it to the entire county. Furthermore, he's asking Negro tobacco farmers not to sell their product in Danville markets; instead, they're to truck it out of the country. Yesterday, Danville's public schools were desegregated. Seven Negro children attended classes along with whites.

Civil rights leaders in Plaquemine, La., are now turning to a mass boycott of downtown stores, following unsuccessful demonstrations which occurred last week. Plaquemine officials effectively throttled the demonstrations by jailing 200 demonstrators, among them James Farmer, National Director of the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE). Also, the town obtained a Federal court injunction against further mass marches and rallies.

But now Negro leaders see the boycott as a weapon to tighten the economic screws on the community. They are laying plans for bus convoys to roll into Baton Rouge, a dozen or so miles away, where Negroes from Plaquemine will do their shopping, if the leadership prevails.

Pressing Economic Warfare

Negroes in other Southern towns are pressing economic war. In Sumter, S.C., Negroes are being transported to Charlotte to shop. A boycott is also in effect in Charleston. In these and other places, Negroes have been heartened by successful boycott and picketing in such spots as New Orleans, where an Easter boycott was followed by the hiring of Negro sales personnel in downtown stores; and in Dallas, where drug stores were forced to take on Negro clerks. Possible future pressure points, particularly aimed at upgrading of job opportunities: Houston, Shreveport, La., Hot Springs, Ark. In Jackson, too, Negroes plan to redouble boycott efforts that began earlier this year.

Elsewhere, Negroes are also driving hard on voter registration. In some cases, these drives are being accompanied by experiments in self improvement. In Spartanburg, S.C., CORE is sponsoring community workshops in which Negro adults are taught to read and write. They're also urged to form neighborhood improvement associations which would help insure that trash is put out promptly and houses painted. "We're trying to prepare them for a fuller citizenship," says Frank Robinson, CORE field secretary, who believes such action will help answer the charge from some whites that Negroes are not responsible citizens.

Predictably, squabbles over strategy have opened deep rifts between Negro factions in some towns. In Savannah, the NAACP refused to support mass marches held downtown in July by the Chatham County Crusade for Voters (CCC), a former NAACP voter-registration arm that separated from the parent group and was converted into a direct action organization. The NAACP, dismayed at what it considered questionable elements attracted by the CCC, says its youth leaders were already negotiating with businessmen over admission to restaurants, bowling alleys and other facilities when the demonstrations erupted.

A Shaky Alliance

Both sides overtly have patched their differences, and businessmen have agreed to a desegregation plan effective Oct. 1. But the Negro alliance is shaky and businessmen fear squabbles among rival Negro groups could touch off new troubles.

It appears Negroes will need all the solidarity they can muster to combat the growing skill shown by many of the so-called "white power structures" with which they'll have to deal. In some cities, such as Shreveport and Danville, adult civil rights leaders have been charged with contributing to the delinquency of minors after demonstrations by Negro youths; Jackson and Danville, among others, have obtained injunctions against demonstrating. Savannah officials have robbed the CCC of its leadership by holding leaders in jail for extended periods on peace warrants. In other places, bail is set at high levels and cash instead of property is required for bond.

The determination of some white authorities to crush demonstrations and other direct action movements is exemplified by the city of Jackson. The Mississippi capital in June alone spent an extra $150,000 on its law enforcement program to meet the Negro demonstration efforts. Much of it went to overtime pay for policemen but $50,000 went for additional jail facilities. "We don't regret a penny of it," says Mayor Allen C. Thompson.

While this summer's rash of public demonstrations (the Justice Department counts 1,122 since it began tallying them on May 20) will undoubtedly taper off, no one expects they'll stop completely. There's a feeling they've been more successful in the North than in the South, for instance, and any decline there would be less drastic than in Dixie. Some Negro leaders also claim that "spontaneous" demonstrations are apt to break out when newly-militant Negroes become aroused over some situation—such as Congressional refusal to pass a strong civil rights law.

The Atlanta Journal
"COVERS DIXIE LIKE THE DEW"
D. 259,003

AUG 2 7 1963

Chatham Righters To Get New Office

Special to The Atlanta Journal

SAVANNAH, Aug. 27 — The Chatham County Crusade of Voters is moving from its rent-free office in quarters of a subversive-branded union "to protect our own reputation," its president has announced.

Hosea Williams, also president of the Southeastern Georgia Crusade for Voters, said he hopes the civil rights organization can relocate by Wednesday. Two offices are being considered, he said.

The organization is now using quarters of the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers, which has been labeled Communist-controlled by the Subversive Activities Control Commission of the federal government. The union is appealing.

THE CIVIL RIGHTS leader admitted some top echelon personnel of the union have been cited for subversive activity. But he denied that any members of the Savannah local are guilty. "I have no doubt of their patriotism," he said.

He said the decision to move offices was made because his organization "must be beyond criticism."

In announcing the imminent move, the civil rights leader also said he believes Georgia Atty. Gen. Eugene Cook and U.S. Atty. Gen. Robert Kennedy should investigate the Savannah local and make public its findings.

HE CHARGED the controversy here stems from a "witch-hunt" by The Atlanta Constitution.

The civil rights leader said his organization is financially broke and is appealing for aid from the Voter Education Project of the Southern Regional Council.

He said if aid can be obtained, his organization will concentrate on voter registration and organizing "adult citizenship schools." Unless aid is forthcoming, however, he said the voter registration drive may be "doomed."

No more street demonstrations are planned at this time, he said.

THE ATLANTA CONSTITUTION
For 95 Years the South's Standard Newspaper
D. 202,635

AUG 2 8 1963

Voter Crusade Demonstrates Wisdom In Decision to Vacate Free Office

The decision of the Chatham County Crusade for Voters to relinquish free office space, supplied by a union with alleged Communist ties, should be a lesson all around.

Except among those who oppose equal rights movements with or without provocation, the Crusade's action should show good faith.

And for the Crusade itself, the whole episode is a sobering reminder that reformers have a special duty to be above suspicion.

The International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers has been declared Communist-controlled by the federal Subversive Activities Control Commission.

The commission's findings are on appeal. Furthermore, the Crusade's president, Hosea Williams, said he knew of no members of the Savannah local engaged in subversive activities.

Whatever the truth of the charges, the reputation of the union is such that its involvement hurts the Crusade. Mr. Williams said the bad publicity was "beneficial in one way" because he "had no idea how much damage" could be done to the civil rights movement by the involvement.

That is straight to the point. Those who oppose Negro efforts for equal justice seized upon the free office in an effort to weave a pattern of Communist conspiracy around the perfectly respectable activities the Crusade, Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., the Southern Regional Council and anyone or anything else in sight.

It should be no surprise that Communist efforts to divide Americans include concentrating on a real weakness: our failure to live up at times to the promises of the American creed.

That Negroes consistently and almost unanimously over the years have rejected hypocritical Communist overtures is a credit to their loyalty and restraint. Action of the Chatham Crusade fits well into that tradition.

The New York Times
WESTERN EDITION
D. 100,000

AUG 29 1963

SPARKED BY SIT-IN IN GREENSBORO, N.C.

Militancy Has Swept the Nation, Giving Negroes New Confidence

By CLAUDE SITTON
Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Aug. 28 — The changing mood of the Negro people and the urgency of their drive for equality emerged dramatically today in a show of strength by a protest movement only three-and-a-half years old.

The outpouring of Negroes and their white supporters raised a serious question as to whether the Kennedy Administration's civil rights proposals could ease the national crisis over the issue, even if they were adopted by a seemingly reluctant Congress.

Few who saw the marchers or talked with their leaders could be but impressed by their enthusiasm, determination and confidence. Few could but ask where was the seeming resignation with which many Negroes once accepted their place in American society. It seemed to have disappeared forever.

That resignation was always more apparent than real. This was demonstrated frequently in the past by the Negroes relatively frequent, if often forgotten, revolts against oppression dating back to the earliest slave uprisings.

Time and again the Negro's hopes were raised by piecemeal steps toward equality: the Emancipation Proclamation, the social changes growing out of two world wars and the Supreme Court decision in 1954 against public school segregation. But these resulted largely from action by whites.

Now, his leaders' statements, his own militant behavior and the new light in which others see him show that he is no longer an interested bystander in the civil rights struggle.

Today's appeal to Congress and the nation, more than anything else, served notice that the Negro believes that he is as much a master of his destiny as any American.

This significant change began to emerge three-and-a-half years ago in Greensboro, N. C., a Piedmont city of 119,574 persons whose industrial growth and two party politics make it a symbol of the changing South.

For Negroes, the year 1960 had opened on a somber note. A Federal grand jury at Biloxi, Miss., refused to indict suspects in the slaying of Mack Charles Parker, a Negro who had been dragged from a jail cell in Poplarville, Miss., and lynched while awaiting trial on a charge of raping a white RICHMOND, KY.

REGISTER
D. 5,105

AUG 29 1963

MARCH ON WASHINGTON WAS A PEACEFUL DEMONSTRATION

It is gratifying that the Negro march on Washington was completely without untoward incident. The vast throng was orderly and the complete lack of violence was fortunate. The leaders are to be commended for this, as are the followers.

Some of the speakers called for an extension of demonstrations across the country in a sustained effort to create support for civil rights legislation. We doubt the wisdom of this.

It is becoming increasingly apparent that demonstrations "are not a magic formula" says Paul Anthony, field director of the Southern Regional Council, a respected bi-racial human rights group. In some southern communities Anthony said "white resistance just solidifies", following demonstrations.

In demonstrations in southern communities high school Negro students have formed a large portion of the demonstrators. With the students returning to school it will be more difficult to assemble big crowds to stage demonstrations.

The impression prevails that Negro demonstrations have been more successful in the North than in the South. In some Southern communities it seems likely that the strategy will be changed, with emphasis being shifted to registering of Negro voters.

his own militant behavior and the new light in which others see him show that he is no longer an interested bystander in the civil rights struggle.

Today's appeal to Congress and the nation, more than anything else, served notice that the Negro believes that he is as much a master of his destiny as any American.

This significant change began to emerge three-and-a-half years ago in Greensboro, N. C., a Piedmont city of 119,574 persons whose industrial growth and two party politics make it a symbol of the changing South.

For Negroes, the year 1960 had opened on a somber note. A Federal grand jury at Biloxi, Miss., refused to indict suspects in the slaying of Mack Charles Parker, a Negro who had been dragged from a jail cell in Poplarville, Miss., and lynched while awaiting trial on a charge of raping a white woman.

Tuskegee Report Noted

Tuskegee Institute, in its annual report on race relations, asserted that aside from action by Federal courts and agencies the nation had done little in 1959 to improve the Negroes' lot.

There had been earlier indications, principally in the Montgomery, Ala., bus boycott in 1955-56 that Negroes might find the unity necessary for a broadside assault on segregation and discrimination. But nothing approaching it developed until four youths from North Carolina Agricultural and Technical College walked into the F. W. Woolworth store on Greensboro's North Elm Street at 4:45 P.M. Feb. 1, 1960, and sat down at the "white" lunch counter.

There had been other sit-ins but this one marked the beginning of a series that swept the South and later evolved into a widespread civil rights movement. This generated the crisis now facing the entire nation.

The sit-ins were at first dismissed as just another college fad. But as their frequency increased, whites appeared baffled. Mayor William G. Enloe of Raleigh, N. C., issued a statement at the time that reflected the false hope with which some comforted themselves.

"It is regrettable that some of our young Negro students would risk endangering Raleigh's friendly and cooperative race relations by seeking to change a long-standing custom in a manner that is all but destined to fail," he said.

White Southerners appealed to Negro leaders to halt the demonstrations. Instead, these leaders expressed support for the students, who had become almost overnight the cutting edge of the drive for equality. Signs of dissatisfaction over the slow pace of desegregation in schools and other public facilities became increasingly evident throughout the Negro community.

Informal organizations sprang up at colleges and universities outside the South to support the demonstrators. Even a few white Southern students joined Negroes at lunch counters in Durham, N.C., Nashville and Atlanta.

Far more than the Supreme Court school decision, the sit-ins convinced white leaders in the South that the end of segregation was inevitable. A surprising number of them outside the hard-core segregationist states sought to find a compromise. Although many of them were motivated by economic considerations stemming from the threat of disorder, a number of communities nevertheless removed racial barriers for the first time without legal compulsion.

Seven months after the sit-ins had begun, the Southern Regional Council reported that a survey had found that at least 70,000 Negroes and whites had actively participated in the protests. The campaign had spread to all of the Southern and Border states as well as into Nevada, Illinois and Ohio—twenty in all. An estimated total of 3,600 students and their supporters had been arrested.

But these, perhaps, were the least important results of the demonstrations. Profound changes began to become apparent with the civil rights movement, its leaders and its organizations. These changes included the formation of a new group.

This took place in April, 1960, when representatives of student groups in the South and North met at Shaw University in Raleigh on Easter weekend and formed the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee. Members of Snick, as it is popularly known, soon became and remain today the shock troops of the civil rights struggle in the South.

The Congress of Racial Equality, which had pioneered the sit-ins following its founding in Chicago in 1942, guided and advised many of the demonstrations in 1960 and thus gained a foothold in the South.

The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., who had gained prominence as a leader of the Montgomery bus boycott, stepped up the activity of his Southern Christian Leadership Conference. He founded the organization, chiefly a coalition of local groups led by Negro ministers, in 1957.

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, oldest and largest of the civil rights organizations, began to place increasing emphasis on sit-ins and other forms of direct action against racial barriers. The stimulus came from criticism that its leaders had relied too heavily on legal action.

One success followed another as the movement picked up strength and intensity. Additional impetus came from the Kennedy Administration's inauguration of a much stronger civil rights policy. Negroes continued to find a sympathetic hearing in the Federal courts, escpecially above the District Court level.

The sit-ins at luch counters lost momentum but Negroes turned to other forms of protest in attacking segregation in restaurants, churches, parks, playgrounds and beaches. They also began to press for equal job opportunity, now their chief goal throughout much of the nation.

The Freedom Riders met a riotious reception in Anniston, Birmingham and Montgomery, Ala., in May, 1961. This phase of the movement was short-lived and involved no more than 1,000 persons. But it brought a ruling from the Interstate Commerce Commission prohibiting segregation on buses and in bus terminals and it spurred Justice Department action against all segregation in public transportation.

The demonstrations in the South led Negroes in the North to take a critical look at their own position. They soon joined the struggle with drives against de facto school segregation and discrimination in housing and employment.

White Southerners reacted to the rising pressure by making token adjustments, sometimes violently but far more frequently with peaceful, though grudging, acceptance of the inevitable. However, Negroes met increasing resistance as the tide of social change rolled into the Deep South.

The admission of two Negroes to the University of Georgia led to a riot. This was followed by the state's retreat from its policy of massive resistance to desegregation in education and the peaceful enrollment of Negroes in four Atlanta high schools.

This year brought what some already are calling the turning point of the fight for equality. It began with a spirited drive by Negroes of the Mississippi Delta for voter registration, highlighted by the demonstrations and arrests in Greenwood.

But it was the conflict between Negroes and resisting white segregationists in Birmingham, with its police dogs and fire hoses, that caught the attention of the nation and touched off demonstrations in the South and North.

Out of Birmingham, one observer has said, came a realization that "the alternatives may not be those of the civil war—indivisible union or irreparable separation—but they are no less stark and serious: total equality or total repression."

In a very real sense, this is the question some observers think was put to the Congress today.

St. Petersburg Times
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
D. 127,804 S. 132,035

AUG 29 1963

APPRAISAL

Negro Now Becoming Master Of His Determination Replaces Acceptance Of Fate

By CLAUDE SITTON

Special To The Times
From The New York Times

WASHINGTON—The Negro's changing mood and the urgency of his drive for equality emerged dramatically yesterday in a show of strength by a protest movement only three and a half years old.

The massed ranks of the demonstrators before the Lincoln Memorial indicated that the civil rights campaign was still gathering momentum and that it could not be slowed, much less reversed.

THE OUTPOURING of Negroes and their white supporters raised a serious question as to whether the Kennedy administration's civil rights proposals could ease the national crisis over the issue even if they were adopted by a seemingly reluctant Congress.

Those who saw the marchers or talked with their leaders were impressed by their enthusiasm, determination and confidence. One wondered if the seeming resignation with which many Negroes once accepted their place in American society has disappeared forever.

Time and again the Negro's hopes have been raised by piecemeal steps toward equality: the Emancipation Proclamation, the social changes growing out of two world wars and the 1954 Supreme Court decision against public segregation. But these resulted largely from action by whites.

Yesterday his leaders' statements, his own militant behavior and then ew light in which others see him show that the Negro is no longer a [illegible] interested bystander in the civil rights struggle. And yesterday's appeal to Congress and the nation, more than anything else, served notice that he believes he is as much a master of his own destiny as any American.

THIS SIGNIFICANT change began to emerge three and a half years ago in Greensboro, N.C., a Piedmont city of 119,574 persons whose industrial growth and two-party politics make it a fitting symbol of the changing South.

For Negroes, 1960 had opened on a somber note.

Tuskegee Institute, in its annual report on race relations, asserted that aside from action by federal courts and agencies the nation had done little in 1959 to improve the Negro's lot.

There had been indications in the 1955-56 Montgomery, Ala., bus boycott that Negroes might find the unity necessary for a broad-scale assault on segregation and discrimination. But nothing approaching it developed until four youths from North Carolina A. & T. College walked into Woolworth's store on Greensboro's North Elm Street at 4:45 p.m. the afternoon of Feb. 1, 1960, and sat down at the "white" lunch counter.

This marked the beginning of a widespread civil rights movement and generated the crisis now facing the entire nation.

DISMISSED at first as just another college fad, the sit-ins increased and the whites appeared baffled. Mayor William G. Enloe of Raleigh, N.C., issued a statement at the time that reflected the false hope that prevailed.

"It is regrettable that some of our young Negro students would risk endangering Raleigh's friendly and cooperative race relations by seeking to change a long-standing custom in a manner that is all but destined to fail," said the mayor.

White Southerners appealed to Negro leaders to halt the demonstrations. Instead, these leaders expressed support for the students, who had become almost overnight the cutting edge of the drive for equality. And dissatisfaction over the slow pace of desegregation in schools and other public facilities became increasingly apparent.

Far more than the Supreme Court school decision, the sit-ins convinced white leaders in the South that the end of segregation was inevitable. And a surprising number of them outside the hard core segregationist states sought to find a compromise. While many of them were motivated by economic considerations stemming from Negro boycotts and the loss of white business that resulted from the threat of disorder, a number of communities nevertheless removed racial barriers for the first time without legal compulsion.

SEVEN MONTHS after the sit-in's began, the Southern Regional Council reported that 3,600 students and their supporters had been arrested.

John H. Wheeler, a Durham, N.C., Negro lawyer and president of the Mechanics and Farmers Bank, said that the Negro community had been divided in the past over the issue of pressing for desegregation, "not because it didn't want it but because it wasn't convinced that it could take place."

One success followed another as the movement picked up strength and intensity. Additional impetus came from the Kennedy administration's stronger civil rights policy. And Negroes continued to find a sympathetic hearing in the federal courts.

This year brought what some already are calling the turning point of the fight for equality. It began with a spirited drive by Negroes of the Mississippi Delta for voter registration, highlighted by demonstrations and arrests in Greenwood.

But the conflict between Negroes and resisting white segregationists in Birmingham, with its police dogs and fire hoses, caught the attention of the nation and touched off a wave of demonstrations in the South and North.

Out of Birmingham, one observer has said, came a realization that "the alternatives may not be those of the civil war — indivisible union or irreparable separation — but they are no less stark and serious: total equality or total repression."

This is the question some observers think was put to the Congress yesterday by the Negro's mass appeal.

—AP Wirephoto

'FREEDOM MARCH' LEADERS MEET PRESIDENT KENNEDY AT WHITE HOUSE

. . . after mass rally at Lincoln Memorial. From left, Whitney Young, National Urban League; Dr. Martin Luther King, Christian Leadership Conference; John Lewis, Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee; Rabbi Joachim Prinz, American Jewish Congress; Dr. Eugene P. Blake, National Council of Churches; A. Philip Randolph, AFL-CIO vice president; Kennedy; Walter Reuther, United Auto Workers; Vice President Lyndon Johnson, rear, and Roy Wilkins, NAACP.

ATLANTA, GA.
WORLD (N)
D. 29,800

AUG 30 1963

Little Known Foundation Aids Civil Rights Efforts

NEW YORK — (ANP) — More than $1,000,000 has been quietly pumped into the civil rights fight since 1958 by a young publicity shy sort of a distinguished American artist and his wife who is the granddaughter of the powerful Pennsylvania industrialist, Andrew Mellon.

Through their Tactonic Foundation, Stephen R. Currier, who is 32 and his wife, Audrey, have given financial aid to such organizations as the NAACP, The National Urban League, the Southern Regional Council and the Potomac Institute, created by them "to eliminate discrimination and advance equal opportunity for all Americans."

Currier was largely responsible for the recent decision of seven pre-dominantly Negro civil rights organizations to establish common fund-raising units to meet the additional financial burden of the great increase in civil rights activities.

Currier, is the son of the late Richard Currier, a painter who lived for many years in Europe and of Mrs. Elizabeth Galt Griscom Currier.

His wife is the former Audrey Bruce, daughter of David K. E. Bruce, United States Ambassaor to Britain, and Bruce's former wife, Mrs. Alisa Mellon Bruce. Mrs. Currier's mother is the daughter of the late Andrew Mellon, one-time Secretary of the Treasury.

The Curriers established the foundation because they believed that they, as possessors of wealth and the advantages that went with it, had a deep obligation to the less privileged.

Determined to put their money to the best possible use, they made a thorough study of the field of philantropy and the work done by other foundations.

They concluded that certain areas, such as higher education, medicine, sience and the arts, were already well served financially and decided to concentrate primarily on race relations, child welfare and mental health.

Studies made under the auspices of the foundation or with its financial help then convinced the Curriers that the most serious problem was that of the "deprived" Negro.

Of the money they have put into the foundation from year to year, more and more has gone to help solve this problem.

Complete figures on the foundation's grants are not available, but those that are, show that in 1960, $162,000 was devoted to race relations, in 1961, $260,200, and in 1962, $318,500. Already this year the foundation has committed $400,000 to this work.

In addition to race relations, grants have been made for youth and welfare work, for a study of youth unemployment, for mental health and urban problems, and to community and neighborhood organi-ations.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA.
FLORIDA STAR (N)
W. 22,391

AUG 31 1963

$1 Million Aid Give Civil Rights Groups

NEW YORK -- (ANP) -- More than $1,000,000 has been quietly pumped into the civil rights fight since 1958 by a young publicity shy son of a distinguished American artist and his wife who is the granddaughter of the powerful Pennsylvania industrialist Andrew Mellon.

Through their Tactonic Foundation, Stephen R. Currier, who is 32 and his wife, Audrey, have given financial aid to such organizations as the NAACP, The National Urban League, the Southern Regional Council and the Potomac Institute, created by them "to eliminate discrimination and advance equal opportunity for all Americans."

Currier was largely responsible for the recent decision of seven predominantly Negro civil rights organizations to establish common fund-raising units to meet the additional financial burden of the great increase in civil rights activities.

Currier, is the son of the late Richard Currier a painter who lived for many years in Europe, and of Mrs. Elizabeth Galt Griscom Currier.

His wife is the former Audrey Bruce, daughter of David K.E. Bruce, United States Ambassador to Britain, and Bruce's former wife, Mrs. Alisa Mellon Bruce. Mrs. Currier's mother is the daughter of the late Andrew Mellon, one-time Secretary of the Treasury.

PROGRESSIVE
MADISON, WIS.
MONTHLY 32,000

AUG 1963

All God's Chillun

by MARGARET LONG

It is the Southern fashion these days to speak of the "remarkable progress" of Southern Negroes who, we all agree, have "come a lawng way" since Emancipation.

Segregationists cite this advance to prove that colored people, though inferior and unworthy to be our peers, still enjoy such generous treatment under our separate system that "the exceptions" among them ascend rocket-like to professions, wealth, and artistic success. Desegregationists and "moderates" regard this rise as comforting evidence that Negroes will not debase our white schools, befoul decent housing, or marry our white daughters and sisters if they get their rights. "Extreme" liberals, or integrationists, who want us all to be not only legal equals but friends down here in the South, behold the general Negro advance, and the brilliant victory of a few over brutal obstacles, as a happy sign that all God's chillun got wings, and that the best of us manage to fly even with clipped wings.

We extremists on the human side also have a rather rabid tendency to believe and suggest, if not state outright, that Negroes are better than white people and can do no wrong. I think it is possible to substantiate the first notion, and now propose to do so, and even to proclaim the obvious fact that Negroes are leading the multicolored South out of our common bondage. But after fifteen years of occasional "mixing and mingling," as our conservative politicians call socializing friendships between Negroes and white people, I cannot, alas, conclude that Negroes can do no wrong.

Some Negroes I know can inform, delight, and enlarge, and others can misinform, exasperate, and, worst of all, bore. I have an admirable white friend, an energetic and intelligent woman whose devotion to our slowly-arriving free society is important to us in Atlanta. She likes and approves of all Negroes, as far as I can see, and I'm very much afraid that her rectitude and ardor have led her into another kind of racism. Many Southern Negroes are as wrong-headed, prejudiced, and tedious as many Southern whites, which seems inescapable since we have all been together in this mess for 300 years.

I cannot appraise the emancipated slaves of 100 years ago, or measure or demonstrate the extent of their advance this year in Dixie, as I don't know any emancipated slaves to stack up against the Freedom Riders, Ph.D's, domestics, clubwomen, and writers who are my Negro friends this century. I am, however, old enough to have known several former slaves who were, despite "emancipation" of fifty, sixty, or seventy years, still in a condition of real bondage, and who bore that bondage with a spirited strength, ironic sophistication, and transforming kindness which seems to me to animate and uphold the Negro movement presently liberating the South.

When I was five years old and my little sister was three, my mother and

MARGARET LONG is information director of the Southern Regional Council and editor of New South. She has worked as a reporter for a number of Southern papers and is the author of two novels, "Louisville Saturday" and "Affair of the Heart."

father, who, as I look back on them, suggest a variation of the simple felicity of the song, "Your pappy's rich and your mammy's good-lookin" (my pappy, a newspaperman, wasn't rich but my mammy, a blue-eyed, black Irish type, was certainly good-looking), would leave us with old Aunt Anne when they went out for gala evenings. I somehow blend the ironed starch and clean snuff smell of Aunt Anne with my mother's redolence of violet perfume and seal fur as she kissed us goodbye, Daddy's tiny Christmas-gift diamonds glittering in her ears. I don't know if it was the gayety of Daddy's party mood, or Mother's fragrance, or the presence of Aunt Anne that made their leave-takings so delightful and beglamored; but they departed, good-looking, good-smelling, and laughing, in a chorus of Aunt Anne's reassuring farewells and our high cries of good night and have-a-nice-time, a commotion comparable to take-off on a world tour.

Then we would turn with joy to Aunt Anne who stood there at the age of ninety (she calculated) small, shriveled, nut-brown in her drab long dress and impeccably starched white apron and head rag. We sat by her, touched her, felt her smile; her torchy old voice told us enthralling stories as she pinched snuff, endured us late, and got us to bed with no protest. Sometimes she lay down beside one or the other of us, and we loved the presence of the aged, strong body, the beloved face, and the rich, murmuring voice. I think she told us a lot of Bible stories, but she never scared us.

Before I was five, old Mrs. Keenan, a retired school teacher innocent of modern methods, taught me the alphabet, the phonetic sounds of each letter and diphthongs, and in a couple of weeks, long before school, I spelled out the words and recognized their sound with the exhilarating discovery that I could read. My parents were equally elated the time I put together the slant, black letters of a magazine name and cried out: "Saturday Evening Post!" A week later, when they were out and Aunt Anne couldn't, of course, find Miss Hazel Gewinner's name in the phone book to call and tell them about a long distance call, I was proud to find G-e-w—in the directory. I think it was then that Aunt Anne sighed out her ambition to read the Bible and I said, "I can show you how, Aunt Anne."

So I did, starting with the ABC's, as old Mrs. Keenan had started me. Sitting in her lap, with my little sister big-eyed at Aunt Anne's effort or falling asleep with her golden head on the white apron, I'd show her the letters and she would say them, short or long, and hard or soft, after me. The next time Aunt Anne came we started on my first-grade primer, and she quickly spelled and pronounced her marveling way through it, as Sister jumped and laughed at Aunt Anne's triumph. She started on the newspaper with my halting help, and we corrected one another. She began her Bible at home and in a few months had spelled and read her way through it, with loud praise to the Lord, and me.

I remember how her laughter rejoiced us little girls and enchanted my father. I can see now the expression of awed tenderness—awe for her sharply worded wisdom and tenderness for her tough, loving old age—on my mother's face when they talked woman-talk about men, children, cooking, friends, spites, and angers. I don't remember what Aunt Anne laughed at, but my feeling is that her mirth was comic and profoundly ironic. I don't know what advice or Biblical injunctions she offered my young mother, but I nostalgically feel them as tinged with forgiveness, cynicism, and a scorn which was high, humble, and tolerant of the human condition.

As an eighteen-year-old cub reporter in Macon, Georgia, I was sent to the Spring Street home of "an interesting old Nigra" to gather material for an uneasy and audacious feature story on her past grandeur as the wife of a city councilman during Reconstruction. She was Airey Sellers, whose forebears were embarrassingly rich, Ohio-educated, and said to have, at least one of them, fought on the Union side. When I ascended the steps of the cottage and entered the old-fashioned parlor, dark with ancient mahogany, walnut, and gold-framed portraits of formidable Negroes, I encountered an old woman of mulatto color and a shriveled, arrogant face with heavy lids over hazel eyes, flaring nostrils, and a wide mouth set in hauteur. She was enthroned in a rose-back chair.

"Airey," I began brightly, in the diffident and cordial voice with which nice white children address aged Nigras, "I hope you'll tell me about the Reconstruction days and your experiences after The Wah."

"Don't call me Airey," replied the dark dowager in a heavy old voice harsh with command and rebuke. "I am old enough to be your grandmother, so you are presumptuous and ill-mannered. Don't call me Auntie or Mammy. I am no relation to you. If you cannot bring yourself to call me Mrs. Sellers, perhaps you might say Madame Sellers. If that courtesy is impossible, then address me as Sellers. Will you sit down?"

I sat down, dizzy at the impact of this unknown viewpoint. Here was a Negro rebuking my white manners with high insolence, with brazen violation of my sacred, undefined duty to suppress Negro dignity. She also was laying claim to all the precepts and feelings of a respectful, inviting style in human encounter—that is, of good manners, especially of young people toward their elders—with which I had been equally indoctrinated. My confusion and dismay were so complete that I don't know what I said, but it was probably something like, "Well, yes ma'am, I'm sorry."

I am ashamed to remember that, from an awful sense of betraying a vague, fierce moral principle, I couldn't say "Mrs.," or "Miz" as we pronounce it, though my instincts pushed me close to it. She accepted my ridiculous "Sellers" and gave me an absorbing interview. My vivid memory of her rebuke and my confusion have obliterated all of what she said; I remember only her painful lesson in manners.

Mrs. Sellers talked so volubly, opening up a world so unsuspected, that we didn't complete the interview and I returned the next afternoon. I was eager and feeling grandly emancipated from the narrow use of first names for venerable old Negroes, and Mrs. Sellers was gracious. She presented her granddaughter, a pretty little lightbrown girl about my age, as Miss Sellers, and compounded the shock of presenting a Negro contemporary to me as a social equal by asking if I'd like some lemonade. My dilemma was again excruciating, with the sense of betraying some mysterious morality, as I drank lemonade with them. It was excellent lemonade on that sweltering August day, and as I departed I was so undone that I thanked both Mrs. Sellers and Miss Sellers for a lovely afternoon and the particularly refreshing lemonade. "What else could I do?" I asked myself. I don't know how long I pondered the question, finally to wonder what wickedness lurks in civility to Negroes.

The Reverend Isom Ivins was never a slave or a Reconstruction Negro in high political position over Southern whites, because he wasn't that old. He was a preacher in Macon, and like most Negro clerics of that day, I reckon he had to wash white windows and hoe white gardens and mow white lawns to support his family. We little girls were delighted when Isom came to mow the lawn or chop out the grass in the paving cracks or weed the collia and salvia beds around the house. We loved his deep and melodious preacher's voice, his embracing smile, and his pleasure in children. We also loved his children and grandchildren, black, handsome, hardworking, and entertaining "good Nigras" who gave you your money's worth and some of whom went to college.

One June morning my mother looked with a brooding puzzlement out of the window to the front yard. There my little sister, a fair five-year-old with golden curls and great blue eyes, was tagging after Isom at his yard work in the summer sunshine. Isom, a heavy black man with an aquiline face, smiled his sweet, white smile at her as she danced around him asking questions which amused him and as he made replies which fascinated her. I don't know what they were talking about, and only see now the sunlit picture of the little golden girl and the splendid black patriarch in soft rapport on the grass around our cedar tree.

"I sometimes think," my mother mused, regarding the fair child and Engelhardt in The St. Louis Post-Dispatch

"There's a Lion in the Streets"

the old black preacher, "that something is all wrong when you children can call a grand old man like Isom by his first name."

Of course, everything was all wrong when, in the Southern pattern of "good manners," we gently and inexorably degraded the Negroes we loved and respected most with this refusal to address them courteously or even to permit our children to accord their black betters this respect.

I am aware that it is suspect and offensive to recall, with love and wonder, the "old slave-type of darkies," but I can't forget the dark, humor-rich, and generous men and women who bore their oppressions with great grace. (I do not forget, of course, the Negroes whose drunkenness, rages, ill-tempers, and sullen humility filled the small-town jails on weekends, erupted in wild knifings and beatings in the dark alleys, and rendered white households wretched with silent servant hatred. Nor do I forget the stubborn refusal of whites to understand the anguish behind this behavior.) I know these generous, benevolent figures from my childhood, with their ironic laughter and easy airs of humility, are what rebellious young Negroes today call "Uncle Toms" and scorned "Old Mammy" folks whom the New Negro does not enjoy invoking.

It occurs to me that we New White Folks, or whatever we are, are entitled to much more shame at the recollection of our absurdly lordly forebears, strutting through the paces of a cruel and arrogant system, and that, as the years rolled by and the darkness is dissipating, the Negroes emerge wiser, braver, and sweeter by far than the masters they now assail with sacrificial and nonviolent demands and with their invitation to the forgiveness of freedom and friendship together.

I believe that the Negroes, in their most abject debasement and repression, must have been bigger and more human than the whites who underpaid, overworked, humiliated, and sometimes lynched them and then proclaimed the corroding lie that this Way of Life was mutually happy. I can remember the irony around the old black mouths, the occasional suppressed amusement playing around young lips at some "kindly" white admonition or other. I can remember the bitter but delicious laughter of the nurses who accompanied us afternoons to the playground or church steps. "And she say, look like all we done for you, Annabelle, you could git here fo' sebm-thirty!" and the young women's shrieks would rise, beginning low and rich and ascending high and helpless into the summer afternoon air, as Annabelle's friends remembered "all they done for her," like "she woulda been fired if she hadn't come to work sick, that wore out dress they give her and that two dollars they took out for a broken cup."

Ah, they could laugh, and they still can, having earned the sharp freedom of humor and having honed their irony on the hard edges of white fear, tyranny, and pious talk.

It is not the Negroes, it seems to me, who are crippled, confused, and frightened by a system of oppression. They are, rather, toughened, enlarged, and infinitely sophisticated by it—those who weathered it. And today, we see them all over the South, literate, illiterate, well-to-do, and poor, demanding with wisdom and grace the rights which many whites are still resisting with idiot shibboleths and crazy fears which are the wonder of the rational world. And when the white barriers topple and the astonished masters regard Negroes stepping over the broken barricades, it is the Negroes whose wise, generous, and graceful demeanor soothes the trembling whites. Their aplomb handles the confrontation on busses or at polling places, softly meets the gauche and fascinated stares of diners in an integrated restaurant, and gently and adamantly explains Negro requirements to the city politician who is suddenly astute enough to learn a fast lesson in manners and democracy.

I think it is the old love, irony, and patience which is at work on childlike and bewildered white neighbors clinging senselessly to an ancient stance once held sacred, and slowly yielding it with naive elation over the new and natural freedom between two peoples who belonged together all the time.

I think of a young girl named Ruby Doris Smith, who is "jail-crazy," they say in laughing pride. My friend Ruby Doris is an indefatigable revolutionary of that incomprehensible band called the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, which sends young Negroes sitting-in, promoting voter registration, marching, demonstrating, singing, and popping in and out of the foulest jails in the South. By these means SNCC advances the revolution years ahead of the plans of more conservative Negro organizations, which must follow these mad youngsters into the wilds of the deepest South with lawyers, bond money, and big-name support, as in Albany, Georgia, and McComb, Mississippi, to name only two scenes of sensational uprising.

After the Freedom Ride to Jackson, Ruby Doris talked softly, rapidly, and carefully about her ordeal:

"Well, yes, they did put the wrist-breakers on me. You see, I'd had athlete's foot and was scared of the shower and wouldn't go, and the matrons, two big women, put the things on me—they screw, you know, and can break your wrist, but they didn't turn them that hard. They didn't give me a chance to walk, but just dragged me with these things—yes, it hurt—and then put me in the shower, with my clothes on, and they scrubbed me all over with wire brushes they scrub the floor with . . . It was all right, but I still have some trouble with my arms.

"No, I don't hate them; they are acting under orders, for one thing. And they got to where they were kind of friendly with us. We have to show them, it's all a demonstration, even with the wrist-breakers, and it shows them our kind of Negro. Yes, I believe in forgiveness and love and nonviolence. We have to live with these people, and we have to teach them, and they do seem to learn."

I first encountered Miss Ella Baker at a conference of uprising students a couple of years ago in Atlanta. After a speech from Martin Luther King, with his stirring call to heroism, suffering, and the nonviolent life, and his promise of Negro redemption of the South, and a round of the glorious singing which booms and rings through the movement, Miss Baker rose to address the meeting, by then nearly drunk with fervor, courage, and aspiration.

She looked beautiful, in a severely elegant hat, her heavy eyes big in her fine brown face and her busty figure chic in a dark dress. (Miss Baker, I understand, pays two and three dollars for her hats, so it must be the face which endows her with such a costly sheen.) Her voice was like a great bronze bell and she pealed out a demand for morality, self criticism, and mission from these excited youngsters which seemed scarcely attainable in this life. They listened to her as children to a beloved and stern maiden aunt, and seemed as moved by her admonitions as by the heat and beat of their tremendous singing.

She enjoined them to "be a real moral movement" and to purge out "hatred, resentment, and self-seeking." Freedom calls for intelligence, real emotions, and "moral stamina," she said. She warned against "headline hunting," vanity, and action without understanding and moral resolve. For the long pull to integration, she urged "a lot of information with your inspiration—on the history of the South, its psychology of human emotions, and its political forces."

My friend and contemporary, Grace, comes from a long line of elegant and protected Negro educators and was, for years, what a witty mutual friend of ours called "Miss Negro Communication with White Atlanta." She still does a great deal of fruitful communication with a white community which is, to put it kindly, still largely ignorant of Negro aspirations, accomplishments, and feelings. Grace was one of my first Negro friends in Atlanta, and greeted me with the generous hospitality and sensitivity at which upper-class Negroes excel and which charms innocent and unaccustomed whites out of their uneasy gaucherie. One night we sat up all night, telling one another our life stories, Grace talking with tart wit and candor, and tenderness for both our sets of children. By three a.m. our autobiographies seemed nearly identical, including sins, punishments, joys, and triumphs and reactions to them. And we thought, "What's it all about, this white-Negro business, anyway?"

The social grace and generosity of such Negroes is inestimable in helping strange and awkward whites over the barriers between us. Cultivated Negroes I know in several Southern states seem to exhibit all the charm and ease of Southern manner which whites have exalted for generations, but which many of them have to learn all over again from Negroes in the adventure of "socializing," or "mixing and mingling."

This social generosity is not, however, universal among militant new Negroes. The Reverend Wyatt Tee Walker, for instance, next man to Martin Luther King, Jr. in the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, is a tall, slender, dapper young man capable of cool hauteur. Reverend Walker does not exhibit the awesome depth of religious humility and pride which one feels in Dr. King, nor his sweetness of demeanor. You have to wait for Mr. Walker, or court his friendship, which is quite worth the effort. I have often wondered if Mr. Walker, a Virginian, is somewhere along the line kin to Mrs. Airey Sellers, or some haughty President-General of the United Daughters of the Confederacy. I feel sure Mr. Walker is completely committed to loving and forgiving nonviolence which will, Dr. King assures us and convinces me, redeem us all in the South through Negro suffering. But I don't think this loving business comes so easy to Mr. Walker.

I don't know why Mr. Walker reminds me of the Reverend Bascom Anthony, a white Methodist preacher in Macon who died a generation ago. Brother Anthony, as we all called this revered old minister, had none of Mr. Walker's—well, arrogance—but there's something about their preaching which is the same. Brother Anthony preached a sermon, both rousing and intellectual, and would move himself to tears as he stood, a tall, handsome old man with auburn curls about the back of his head, his fine profile raised to God and illumined by rays from the stained glass behind him. Everybody cried with him, and a lot of people hit the sawdust trail, or at least the red carpet in the aisle, to come to Jesus. And, in the course of his rolling sentences, he would lapse into the Middle-Georgia vernacular with corn pone jokes and the double negative-ain't type of ironies on the sins of the congregation.

Young Mr. Walker, when last I heard him, preached a rousing sermon in an Albany, Georgia, church. He was affecting a neat, cropped black mustache and beard trim on his pale-gold, black-eyed face, which made him look like an intense and suffering saint. His sermon began, grave and thoughtfully worked out, about the consecrating drop of blood on Aaron's ear, thumb, and great toe, and its strengthening call to mission. He rose to high demands on the children of God. As usual, in a Negro church, the "Amen's," "Yes, Jesuses" and questioning cries of "We-ell?" punctuated, lifted, and bore his sermon along, until it cracked like a whip as he described the recalcitrance of white Albany, the jailings, the job-firings, and the brutality to little children in county jails. Then he turned to burning satire phrased in pounding Negro colloquialisms, excoriating white oppressions and absurdities, until the high, musical cries and booming "Amen's" and "Well's" rose in ragged rhythm with his sentences. Mr. Walker did not weep, but some of his flock did. His stern call was not to come to Jesus, but to freedom by volunteering for jail the next day.

Brother Anthony was old and white and Methodist, and his style was rollingly grand and colloquially comic by

Herblock in The Washington Post

"You Don't Understand, Boy—You're Supposed to Just Shuffle Along"

turns, stressed, too, with assent from the amen corners. Mr. Walker is young and mulatto and Baptist, and his style is grave and fierce and satirically dialect-shot by turns, fired by congregational ardors. They are preachers of the same school, the one calling the children of God to Jesus and the other to freedom. Brother Anthony was socially delightful in the parlor of a Sunday afternoon, and Mr. Walker is equally so, if he admits you to his favor. Again, one must wonder, what's it all about, black and white preachers, and segregated churches for people who are the same?

As to my proposition, that these Negro Southerners are "superior" to the whites who resist them, it seems evident that people who suffer for what they believe, forgive their oppressors, and persist toward freedom for themselves and those who deny them liberty, are "better" than people who blindly fight so high-minded and human a change.

A trivial and clear example is the little adventure of Fred Powledge, an Atlanta Journal reporter, on one of his jaunts to intermittently erupting Albany. Mr. Powledge, a North Carolina boy, fell into a roadside race discussion with a South Georgia white supremacist.

"You think," the white aborigine demanded, pointing to a nearby Negro, "that nigger is as good as I am?"

"Better," replied Mr. Powledge.

"How come?" demanded the dumbfounded redneck.

"Because," Mr. Powledge rejoined, "he's a gentleman."

As James McBride Dabbs has pointed out, the Negro student movement, supported now by nearly all Negroes in the South, embodies and demonstrates the old professed virtues of the South—courage, love of freedom, religious faith, and good manners—virtues which the white Southerners, as masters, could never achieve. Mr. Dabbs said, more recently, that the Negro has the leadership in the South now, to which "the white responds, or more accurately, reacts . . . dragging his feet until he learns to cooperate," and "wherever the South is going, the Negro is taking him."

Already this seems a vastly better destination for which we are headed, led by better people who have ceased to hate, who risk and suffer for liberty, who offer friendship for enmity, and who embody the virtues the white South long proclaimed but could not practice.

A young member of the Indian parliament, Krishna Chandra Pant (son of the late Govindi Ballahh Pant, disciple and intimate of Gandhi, a minister under Nehru, and the deputy leader of the Congress Party), visited us recently and regarded with deep and wondering eyes the phenomenon of our change which the gentle and insistent Negroes impose on us. He reminded us that never in the long, bloody story of mankind have two races lived in the same place without oppression of one by the other, nor has a subject race ever freed itself without long violence. And with the excitement of a man beholding a great new thing, Mr. Pant predicted a grand and bloodless liberation for us.

Even without Mr. Pant's perspective, it is surely not too sanguine for us to believe that despite the fevers and fires of Oxford, the insane intransigence of Albany, and the mean-hearted fears of segregationists all over the South, our Negroes will bring us together in freedom and friendship such as no peoples of different color have had before.

The Miami Herald
MIAMI, FLA.
D. 342,056 S. 394,039

SEP 1 1963

Rights Report Calls State 'Tight, White'

By PETE MANN
Herald Education Writer

The U.S. Commission on Civil Rights will release soon a wide-ranging and comprehensive study on the Negro's educational and employment status in the State of Florida.

The report was compiled by the commission's Florida Advisory Committee.

Miami Attorney Tobias Simon, who is the committee's secretary, offered this preview Saturday:

"In essence, the report will say that Florida, for all its vaunted progress, is a tight white state . . . run by a white establishment."

Greater Miami will emerge as "way ahead" of the rest of the state in the number of "cracks around the edges" of segregation, he said, but even here the picture is "muddy."

As an example of the Florida problem Simon cited the dilemma of the Negro who seeks a job with the state government.

"Negroes simply are not employed by the state in other than menial tasks, or in jobs where they deal solely with Negroes . . . They are systematically excluded from employment by the state and from job-training opportunities," he said.

And he alleged that the pattern is perpetuated by the county school systems.

"There are very few vocational courses offered to Negroes," Simon said, "even on a separate-but-equal basis. And those that are offered are not in line with space-age opportunities."

Tailoring, barbering, cosmetology — that's the kind of vocational study available to most of Florida's Negroes, he said.

★ ★ ★

Tobias Simon
. . . spokesman

John Hannah
. . . national chairman

Carlos Fernandez
. . . Miami judge

Stanley Milledge
. . . former judge

see and Florida Councils on Human Relations.

Vice chairman is I. H. Burney II of Jacksonville, vice president and secretary of a life insurance firm. He is one of four Negroes on the committee and is active in the Urban League, state and local human relations councils and the Southern Regional Council.

Simon is a member of the American Jewish Congress remaining men on the committee.

And there are two other women: Mabel Norris Chesley, associate editor of the Daytona Beach News-Journal, and Mrs. C. D. Johnson of Quincy, a housewife and former teacher, who is chairman of the Florida Children's Commission.

★ ★ ★

One Meeting

"cracks around the edges" of segregation, he said, but even here the picture is "muddy."

As an example of the Florida problem Simon cited the dilemma of the Negro who seeks a job with the state government.

"Negroes simply are not employed by the state in other than menial tasks, or in jobs where they deal solely with Negroes . . . They are systematically excluded from employment by the state and from job-training opportunities," he said.

And he alleged that the pattern is perpetuated by the county school systems.

"There are very few vocational courses offered to Negroes," Simon said, "even on a separate-but-equal basis. And those that are offered are not in line with space-age opportunities."

Tailoring, barbering, cosmetology — that's the kind of vocational study available to most of Florida's Negroes, he said.

★ ★ ★

Carlos Fernandez
. . . Miami judge

Stanley Milledge
. . . former judge

see and Florida Councils on Human Relations.

Vice chairman is I. H. Burney II of Jacksonville, vice president and secretary of a life insurance firm. He is one of four Negroes on the committee and is active in the Urban League, state and local human relations councils and the Southern Regional Council.

Simon is a member of the American Jewish Congress and the American Civil Liberties Union. He is one of four Miamians on the committee. The others are:

STANLEY MILLEDGE, former Dade Circuit Court judge, who returned to law practice here this year after serving on the law faculty at Stetson University.

CARLOS B. FERNANDEZ, Miami city judge, who is president of the Miami Junior Chamber of Commerce and the Latin American Democratic Club of Miami, and active in the Dade County Council on Community Relations.

MRS. MAYME WILLIAMS, an assistant principal at Booker T. Washington High School, a Negro, who is affiliated with the National Council of Negro Women, the National Conference of Christians and Jews and the Urban League, and is national chairman of the Intergroup Relations Committee.

C. Blythe Andrews, publisher of the Florida Sentinel Bulletin in Tampa, and the Rev. E. C. Tillman, pastor of the Mount Bethel Baptist Church in Daytona Beach, are the other two Negroes.

Episcopal Bishop Henry I. Louttit of Winter Park, Prof. Hal G. Lewis of the University of Florida in Gainesville and the Rev. Robert Caxton Doggett, Methodist minister at Lakeland, are the remaining men on the committee.

And there are two other women: Mabel Norris Chesley, associate editor of the Daytona Beach News-Journal, and Mrs. C. D. Johnson of Quincy, a housewife and former teacher, who is chairman of the Florida Children's Commission.

★ ★ ★

One Meeting Each Month

To compile the data it needs, the advisory committee meets "on the average once a month, without pay," Simon said. Meetings are rotated from one Florida city to another.

So far, they have been held in Daytona Beach, Orlando, the Tampa-St. Petersburg area, Tallahassee, Cocoa, Jacksonville, Miami and most recently in St. Augustine.

The next session is scheduled for Ocala in September.

"We have gotten fantastically good cooperation from city officials wherever we have met. They have come to us with problems; they have admitted that they had segregation troubles," Simon said.

"That is, the cooperation has been good everywhere except in Tallahassee and in St. Augustine, where we were completely boycotted by the white establishment.

"More than 200 townspeople sat through the entire proceeding. They were all Negroes."

St. Augustine, Simon said, is the scene of the state's most serious racial problems. A special report on the situation there already has been filed with the federal Commission on Civil Rights.

GREENSBORO, N.C.
NEWS
D. 91,284 S. 103,452

SEP 4 1963

A Footnote On Labor Day

Most of the Labor Day platitudes of 1963, as reflected in the press Monday, had new and urgent themes.

In a special Labor Day message Labor Secretary Willard Wirtz urged a broadened educational program to train skilled workers and a campaign to curb school dropouts. He was shocked by "the lack of any meaningful action or any visible sense of urgency" about the nation's steady unemployment rate of more than 5 per cent.

Other Labor Day messages tied in the threat of automation with the need for greater job opportunities for Negroes and other minorities. Last week's civil rights march on Washington emphasized "jobs" as importantly as "freedom." Indeed, there are growing signs that the whole civil rights movement may be entering a new phase.

"Negroes are just beginning to realize that big demonstrations of the civil disobedience variety are not a magic formula," Paul Anthony, field director of the Southern Regional Council, told the Wall Street Journal. "Demonstrations have been and will continue to be useful where they can trigger community action. But in some communities the trigger is pulled but the gun doesn't go off. White resistance just solidifies."

In still other communities—and we take Greensboro to be a good example—the demonstrations served the purpose of arousing community sentiment to work on unsolved problems of public service and employment. The city's Human Relations Committee has plunged directly into this task, assisted by the North Carolina Good Neighbor Council. Substantial progress can be expected in this field.

Of course, this whole emphasis might well be reversed if crowds of college students returning to campus this month fail to recognize what has happened since last May and June. If further mass demonstrations threaten the city, the climate of co-operation will be set back and individuals on both sides, who have worked to develop co-ordination, will slacken their efforts.

The job problem, of course, is a difficult one. No employer can take jobs away from established workers to make room for new workers. But opportunities are emerging for minority groups, provided they develop necessary skills and aptitudes to meet the competition.

That is the hope of Labor Day, 1963.

ATLANTA, GA.
WORLD
D. 29,800
PAGE ONE CERTIFIED (N)

SEP 8 1963

Wiley Branton To Spark DeKalb Voter Drive Today

Attorney Wiley A. Branton, Director of the Voter Education project of the Southern Regional Council, will address citizens of Decatur today when Citizenship Sunday is observed by the DeKalb County Citizens Committee.

WILEY BRANTON

Mr. Branton will address a mass meeting, the second of the current voter registration drive, at 3 p. m at Faith Tabernacle Baptist Church, 203 Oliver Street, in Decatur.

Prior to the mass meeting Citizenship Sunday will be observed in the various churches in Dekalb County, Miss Rosetta Williams, Director of the Dekalb Voter Registration Campaign said Friday.

There will be special sermons on the subject of voting, for this program which is designed to step up the voter registration drive in 16 different communities. The drive is in its third week.

SUNDAY PROGRAM

At the mass meeting, Mr. Branton will be introduced by Attorney C. M. Clayton, of Dekalb County.

The speaker, who is spearheading the voter education project in this area, has been working in a cooperative effort with the Congress

ATLANTA, GA.
WORLD
D. 29,800
(N)
PAGE ONE
CERTIFIED
SEP 10 1963

Citizenship Sunday In DeKalb

No Escaping Negro Problem.... Branton

By HARMON G. PERRY

"There's no escape from the Negro problem and the people in America must accept the fact they will have to meet it head-on."

This was the opinion of Attorney Wiley Branton, nationally known civil rights fighter from Little Rock, Arkansas, who delivered a voter registration mass meeting address Sunday for Negro citizens of DeKalb County.

The mass meeting was the second of the series designed to stimulate Negro voter registration, particularly during the current campaign which ends September 16.

Attorney Branton spoke in a serious vein on the importance of Negro voter registration, saying it should be one of the most important conversation pieces in DeKalb County and throughout the country. "Registration and voting is going to do more to bring about changes than anything else". he said.

Branton, who now works with the Southern Regional Council as director of that organization's voter education project, also took pot shots at the resulting effects suffered by the Negro in education, employment, and housing because of the seeds sown by segregation and discrimination.

He said in effect these injusticies stimers the Negro child and makes the Negro himself a perpetrator of prejudice. His advice here suggested the Negro rid himself of prejudice and help make possible a better America for the Negro youth.

The speaker told his audience that should become as much comcerned about living together on earth as he is in putting a human on the moon.

In speaking out advice on self elevation Branton said Negro parents should expose their children to the best education possible with a goal of breaking away from the status quo. "The time has come when the Negro child can set his goals in life the same as any other child" "He can aspire to be anything he wants', he said.

(Continued on Page 6, Col. 5)

No Escaping

(Continued from Page One)

Branton suggested each Negro make himself a committee of one in increasing the number of those registered but he said to register and not vote should void ones right to register.

Branton's appearence at the Faith Tabernacle Baptist Church was sponsored by the DeKalb County Citizens Committee in observance of "Citizenship Sunday" The sponsoring organization has launched a registration drive throughout some 16 communities withing the county. The voter registration campaign is directed by Miss Rosetta Williams with the Rev. William Mosley serving as overall chairman.

The mass meeting closed out with special recognition and awards being given the Washington Park and Scottdale communities for having thus far lead in the registration campaign.

BAINBRIDGE, GA.
POST-SEARCHLIGHT
W. 3,250
PAGE ONE CERTIFIED
SEP 12 1963

MARVIN GRIFFIN

SOME GEORGIANS HAVE ACTED AS IF CRISSIE KEELER HAD COME

Ralph McGill, publisher of the Atlanta Constitution, devotees of the Southern Regional Council, Ivan Allen, Mayor of Atlanta, and other members of the liberal element, "token integration" stable have had a buttoned lip, and have had nothing to write or say about the Walter Stovall-Charlayne Hunter mixed-marriage. In fact, these social reformers have been as quiet as King Tutankhamen's tomb. The news release of the mixed-marriage of the Douglas, Georgia, white boy and the first Negro girl to graduate from the University of Georgia, had the same effect on this crowd as would the appearance of Christine Keeler at a House of Lords social tea. They went out the doors, through the windows and over the walls and hedges. They are like the little boy the lion ate. They have nothing to say.

What is the matter with this crowd, I ask? Even the moderate and liberal governor of this state who dares not oppose the caprices of integrationist propaganda for fear of political reprisal, mustered up enough courage to say "it is a shame and a disgrace". This is the doctrine these people have been preaching. This kind of thing is what they have been encouraging. What has happened to the courage of these sophists when a white boy and a Negro girl were gullible enough to believe what they preached and took them at their words?

NO TIME FOR BITTERNESS

This is not the time for bitterness or ugliness. It is a time of pity. Pity for the parents of the white boy. Pity for those misguided people who fall for the words of false prophets. Pity for a half-breed child that will never have a chance. It is a time though for righteous anger toward the misguided leadership in this nation who would do an engineering job on all of us for political gain and expediency. And they are engineers. They are attempting to ditch, drain and damn this country. Why have not Bobby Kennedy, Jake Javits, Hubert Humphrey et al come out of hiding and told the American people in a loud voice "this is what we have been working to accomplish"?

WHAT I HAVE FOUND OUT DOWN THROUGH THE YEARS

I have many good Negro friends. They are long-headed and intelligent. They have made successes in life. We have talked freely about the spirit of brotherly love, and the importance of both the white and the Negro races working together to make our community and our nation a better land for all of us. I have always contended that the Negro race is to be commended and respected for the one hundred years of achievement and accomplishment since the shackles of slavery were removed. The progress of the race has been remarkable.

(Continued On Page 4)

—Griffin

(Continued from page one)

There is one thing I have never heard one of my Negro friends say and that is "half-caste children would help either race or this country".

On the contrary, they have been positive in their belief and clear in their expression that any Negro who is not proud of his race and yearns to change his color or bring half-breed children into the world is not worth the powder and lead it would take to kill him. "A Negro", they say, "must be big in his own right, and in the color of his own race".

A Negro must be proud of his race for then only does he merit the respect of all men. An American visited Africa not so many years ago, and he said he was impressed by the size and the racial pride of the men in the Watusi tribe. "The men were well over six feet," he said, "and some of them closer to seven feet in height. No one would think of calling these proud warriors, boy". No one would think of belittling the memory of Booker T. Washington or George Washington Carver. They commanded respect because they earned it. There are some truly big Negroes in this country today. They have also earned the respect of all Americans. They have earned it. None of them have advocated mixed marriages and the creation of a mongrel race. They have too much pride in the Negro race.

Walter Stovall says he and Charlayne Hunter dated on the campus of the University of Georgia. They took rides in their automobile. They made trips to Atlanta where the folks have become "sophisticated."

Someone on the campus of the university knew about this. Why wasn't some action taken? The Atlanta Journal knew about it because Stovall was an employee of that newspaper. Why did they not print something about it? The students who had classes with the principals in this mixed marriage knew about it. Students generally knew about it.

Students at the University also state it is general knowledge Stovall always had plenty of money to spend and this money came from the NAACP. They can't prove it, they state, but it is general knowledge.

It appears to me that someone in state government or someone on the campus of the university should concern themselves enough to get at the truth of these statements.

WALL STREET JOURNAL.
CHICAGO, ILL.
D. 254,821
PAGE ONE CERTIFIED
SEP 1 2 1963

Negro Voters

Southern Registration Campaigns Encounter Widespread Indifference

White Obstructionism Also Holds Back Gains; Negroes See Help From U.S. Suits

'Nitty-Gritty' in Tennessee

By BURT SCHORR
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

Seated on a shady doorstep facing Hernando Street in Memphis, 33-year-old Negro factory worker Clover Miller expresses little interest in a Negro voter registration campaign. "I don't know if I want to register," he says. "I never got around to it before."

Near Plaquemine, La., on a lane of weatherbeaten but tidy Negro residences within sight of the Mississippi River levee, barefooted Mrs. Fellonease Mumphrea takes time from supervising the chores of a dozen children and grandchildren to listen to a teenage registration canvasser. "I'm afraid of messing with voting," she says, confiding a nearly insuperable handicap in a state with difficult registration hurdles: "I can't read or write."

Such attitudes are receiving considerable attention these days as civil rights and Negro civic organizations mount the most concerted voter registration drive ever undertaken in Dixie. For despite a summer of anti-segregation ferment, voting canvassers are discovering there is a deep sociological gulf to cross before they can achieve any significant increases in Southern Negro balloting strength.

Overcoming Inertia

"Inertia in the Negro community is one of our biggest problems," comments the Rev. Andy Young, program director for Martin Luther King, Jr.'s Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC). "Everything controlled by whites from the press on down reinforces that inertia. We're just beginning to get a head of steam."

Statistically, the potential for Negro political effectiveness is greater in the South than in other parts of the nation. Negroes comprise nearly 35% of the total population in 10 former Confederate states (excluding Texas), against 10.5% for the U.S. as a whole.

But the Southern Regional Council, an Atlanta-based biracial organization, recently estimated that only 30% of Dixie's approximately 5 million voting-age Negroes are registered. The figure is rising, and the approach of the 1964 Presidential and Congressional races should increase it further—but hardly enough to match the 60% of the South's 17 million voting-age whites who are registered. And if Negro registration does increase substantially, whites can be expected to register and vote in greater numbers, too.

Nevertheless, "the most important step a in other parts of the nation. Negroes comprise nearly 35% of the total population in 10 former Confederate states (excluding Texas), against 10.5% for the U.S. as a whole.

But the Southern Regional Council, an Atlanta-based biracial organization, recently estimated that only 30% of Dixie's approximately 5 million voting-age Negroes are registered. The figure is rising, and the approach of the 1964 Presidential and Congressional races should increase it further—but hardly enough to match the 60% of the South's 17 million voting-age whites who are registered. And if Negro registration does increase substantially, whites can be expected to register and vote in greater numbers, too.

Nevertheless, "the most important step a Negro can take is in the direction of the ballot box," says Rev. King. Negro voters already have helped elect racially moderate mayors in Atlanta and Birmingham and moderate Congressmen in certain Southern districts. More of them, Negro leaders think, could further weaken resistance of Southern Senators to civil rights bills, make Dixie legislators more inclined to support welfare legislation, and sweep outspoken segregationists from many Southern city halls, county courthouses and state capitols.

Speeding the Drive

So canvassing of unregistered Negroes is expanding rapidly. The Southern Regional Council is coordinating efforts of five Negro rights agencies through a Voter Education Project (VEP), financed with more than $500,000 in grants from several Northern foundations. VEP is supporting 27 local registration campaigns across the South, a dozen more than last year. The Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), one organization getting VEP help, reports 56 staff members and full-time volunteers at work on Southern voting projects. Last summer it had only four.

The drives face much white resistance. In southwest Georgia, three Negro churches used for registration workshops were burned last winter. In Mississippi, VEP says it counted more than 30 acts of violence and intimidation against Negroes interested in registration between January 1961 and March 1963. Mississippi also publishes names of registration applicants; Negroes say this makes it easy for white employers to find and fire Negro workers who want to vote.

Even in areas where U.S. Justice Department surveillance has made whites wary of flagrant discrimination, subtle intimidation is still prevalent. "Negroes find it difficult to face white officials, especially unfriendly ones who call them 'girl' or 'boy,'" says a young registration leader in Savannah, Ga. "Sometimes, even though they know how to read the words in the literacy test, they stammer and are disqualified."

Deep-Rooted Apathy?

But more difficult to deal with than white obstructionism is the apathy expressed by Mr. Miller, the Memphis Negro factory worker, and the fear registration formalities hold for poorly educated Negroes like Mrs. Mumphrea in Louisiana. Both attitudes are deeply rooted in the traditional position Southern society has reserved for the Negro, believe Donald R. Matthew and James W. Prothro, two University of North Carolina political scientists. In a recently published study on Negro voter registration, they wrote:

"Southern Negroes overwhelmingly possess low social status, relatively small incomes and limited education received in inferior schools. These attitudes are associated with low voter turnout among all populations. The low voting rates of Negroes in the South are, perhaps to a large extent, a result of these factors more than a consequence of direct political discrimination by the white community." Their conclusion: "A large, active and effective Negro electorate in the South may have to await a substantial social and economic change."

Negro strategists unwilling to wait that long increasingly believe there's a swifter chance for a big Negro vote in "good sized centers"

Please Turn to Page 8, Column 3

Negro Voters: Dixie Registration Drives Meet Widespread Apathy

Continued From First Page

where harassment is minimal and education and income higher.

Tennessee, which merely requires the registrant to supply his name, address, occupation and birthday, signing with an "X" if illiterate, certainly would be a state to apply this formula. And, in fact, Negroes in Shelby County (Memphis) currently are registering at the rate of around 250 a week, double the white rate. Stimulating the rush is the Oct. 8 cutoff date for registration of voters for the November mayoral election in which segregationist incumbent Henry Loeb is an anticipated candidate.

But the number of Negroes registered still is likely only to return to the high of 78,000 reached in January. Since then, 6,000 Negroes have been removed from the registration rolls for failing to cast a ballot in any general election in the previous four years.

"There was a time when I could put 10,000 to 14,000 on the books in Memphis without any trouble," says W. C. Patton, field secretary for registration and voting of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. "Now we're down to the nitty-gritty, the hard core who've never been interested in politics. We have to do a better job."

Indifference in Atlanta

Lack of support also was the topic of a voter registration progress meeting the other evening in the Atlanta home of Mrs. Bessie Williams. With other volunteers, Mrs. Williams is canvassing the predominantly Negro Seventh Ward's Precinct 7-A as part of a drive by the All Citizens Registration Committee to raise Atlanta Negro registration to 75,000 by the year-end. So far, though, despite the help from radio announcements, the Committee has succeeded in nudging the total only to the 45,000 mark, still well below an estimated figure of 50,000 at the start of the year, and before several thousand were removed from the rolls for failure to vote in past elections.

"Everybody says what ought to be done, but when it comes time to cover the precinct, you don't see them," complains Mrs. Williams, a woman's dress factory employe by day. "We need 100 volunteers to do the job properly in our precinct. But we've only got 20—and you can see how many of those were interested in the meeting tonight," she adds, gesturing to the two workers seated in her living room.

In Rock Hill, S.C., only 13 persons attend a Herman Presbyterian Church workshop to teach applicants how to fill out registration forms. CORE representative Frank Robinson discovers seven are too young to qualify and the rest are already registered. Later he tells a visitor he and a few volunteers have called on 900 Negroes in surrounding York County, but have convinced only 100 to attempt registering. Only about 4,000 of York County's 11,000 voting-age Negroes are now registered, against 20,000 of the county's 32,000 whites age 21 and over.

"Ideally, the church should have been filled," Mr. Robinson says. "But nine out of 10 people we talk to say the Negro has been voting for 20 years (since the U.S. Supreme Court ruled against the all-white primary) and they haven't seen it's done any good."

Short Hours

Mr. Robinson's work is further frustrated because in York as in many Southern rural counties, registration books are open only one day a month this year (three days a month in even-numbered years). Also, says Mr. Robinson, "the working people go to their jobs at 8 and the registrar opens at 9. They get off at 5 and the registrar closes at 5."

Similar problems face the Coordinating Council of Greater New Orleans. The council recently delivered a busload of Negroes to the Orleans Parish (county) registration office in mid-afternoon, only to have many turned away unregistered by the close of business. New Orleans has 17 registration clerks, one for each parish ward; registrar A. P. (Tim) Gallinghouse says it would "upset our registration procedure" to shift clerks to handle a rush of Negroes in a particular ward. He wants them to come in "two or three at a time."

"It would take a hundred years for people to get on the books at that rate," contends Irvin Daniel, the council's director of voter education. "And when they go back to their communities and tell how they've been treated, it discourages others."

New Orleans registration books close Nov. 6 for a hotly contested Louisiana governor's primary. Over the past four months, however, Mr. Daniel's organization has only succeeded in bringing some 1,000 applicants into registration offices. And only a third of these have been added to the roughly 35,000 Negroes on the rolls out of 130,000 of voting age.

Federal Action

Negro leaders think some of their problems could be solved by Federal Government actions. And evidence exists — in at least one of the 47 suits filed so far by the Justice Department to end discrimination against would-be Southern Negro voters — that the results can be dramatic.

In Alabama's Macon County (Tuskegee), where Negroes comprise nearly 85% of the population, a Federal judge in March 1961 ordered the Board of Registrars to cease discrimination. Since then, more than 2,000 Negroes have been added to the voter rolls, raising total Negro registration to about 3,800, outnumbering an estimated 2,900 registered whites.

A pending Justice Department suit being closely watched is against Mississippi and registrars in six of its counties. A hearing on this suit before a Federal judge is expected by next February in Jackson.

Mississippi now requires registrants to be of "good moral character," to fill out a four-page form to perfection, and to read and interpret any one of the state constitution's 285 sections. LeFlore County, which contains the city of Greenwood, recently disqualified an applicant because he couldn't explain section 65, which reads:

"All votes of the final passage of any measure shall be subject to reconsideration for at least one whole legislative day, and no motion to reconsider such vote shall be disposed of adversely on the day on which the original vote was taken, except on the last day of the session."

The Federal suit would make Mississippi return to the registration requirements of the 1890 state constitution. This demanded only that a voter meet age and residence stipulations, be able to read and not have been convicted of certain crimes. Justice Department lawyers believe a victory would speed Negro registration throughout the South, by showing Negroes registration barriers can be broken.

Rights Bill Impact

Proposals in the civil rights package before Congress also would speed relief from discrimination, say Negro leaders. These include giving priority to voter registration suits; appointment of temporary voting referees while the suits are proceeding through the courts, and making a sixth grade education an automatic presumption of literacy. Any versions approved, however, are likely to be somewhat watered down.

Impatient with legal delays, some registration leaders are employing militant tactics to stir the voting ambitions of Negroes. During the recent Mississippi governor's primary, an estimated 1,500 unregistered Negroes attempted to vote under an old statute which allows persons who believe they were "illegally denied registration" to cast ballots. The ballots were disregarded, but registration workers were encouraged by the number filled out.

Street demonstrations protesting voter discrimination have also been used to whip up registration enthusiasm. "We felt something was needed to make the town aware," says Charles Cobb, a Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee field secretary in Greenville, Miss., who led several lightly attended protest marches. "People now call us over to the front porch and at least attempt to talk with us."

But in at least two cases, Savannah and Albany, Ga., such protests may have interfered with registration. VEP funds have been cut off to projects in both cities because field workers became involved in demonstrations and boycotts.

WALL STREET JOURNAL.
DALLAS, TEXAS
D. 71,247
PAGE ONE CERTIFIED
SEP 1 2 1963

Negro Voters

Southern Registration Campaigns Encounter Widespread Indifference

White Obstructionism Also Holds Back Gains, Negroes See Help From U.S. Suits

'Nitty-Gritty' in Tennessee

By BURT SCHORR
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

Seated on a shady doorstep facing Hernando Street in Memphis, 33-year-old Negro factory worker Clover Miller expresses little interest in a Negro voter registration campaign. "I don't know if I want to register," he says. "I never got around to it before."

Near Plaquemine, La., on a lane of weatherbeaten but tidy Negro residences within sight of the Mississippi River levee, barefooted Mrs. Fellonease Mumphrea takes time from supervising the chores of a dozen children and grandchildren to listen to a teenage registration canvasser. "I'm afraid of messing with voting," she says, confiding a nearly insuperable handicap in a state with difficult registration hurdles: "I can't read or write."

Such attitudes are receiving considerable attention these days as civil rights and Negro civic organizations mount the most concerted voter registration drive ever undertaken in Dixie. For despite a summer of anti-segregation ferment, voting canvassers are discovering there is a deep sociological gulf to cross before they can achieve any significant increases in Southern Negro balloting strength.

Overcoming Inertia

"Inertia in the Negro community is one of our biggest problems," comments the Rev. Andy Young, program director for Martin Luther King, Jr.'s Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC). "Everything controlled by whites from the press on down reinforces that inertia. We're just beginning to get a head of steam."

Statistically, the potential for Negro political effectiveness is greater in the South than in other parts of the nation. Negroes comprise nearly 35% of the total population in 10 former Confederate states (excluding Texas), against 10.5% for the U.S. as a whole.

But the Southern Regional Council, an Atlanta-based biracial organization, recently estimated that only 30% of Dixie's approximately 5 million voting-age Negroes are registered. The figure is rising, and the approach of the 1964 Presidential and Congressional races should increase it further—but hardly enough to match the 60% of the South's 17 million voting-age whites who are registered. And if Negro registration does increase substantially, whites can be expected to register and vote in greater numbers, too.

Nevertheless, "the most important step a Negro can take is in the direction of the ballot box," says Rev. King. Negro voters already have helped elect racially moderate mayors in Atlanta and Birmingham and moderate Congressmen in certain Southern districts. More of them, Negro leaders think, could further estimated that only 30% of Dixie's approximately 5 million voting-age Negroes are registered. The figure is rising, and the approach of the 1964 Presidential and Congressional races should increase it further—but hardly enough to match the 60% of the South's 17 million voting-age whites who are registered. And if Negro registration does increase substantially, whites can be expected to register and vote in greater numbers, too.

Nevertheless, "the most important step a Negro can take is in the direction of the ballot box," says Rev. King. Negro voters already have helped elect racially moderate mayors in Atlanta and Birmingham and moderate Congressmen in certain Southern districts. More of them, Negro leaders think, could further weaken resistance of Southern Senators to civil rights bills, make Dixie legislators more inclined to support welfare legislation, and sweep outspoken segregationists from many Southern city halls, county courthouses and state capitols.

Speeding the Drive

So canvassing of unregistered Negroes is expanding rapidly. The Southern Regional Council is coordinating efforts of five Negro rights agencies through a Voter Education Project (VEP), financed with more than $500,000 in grants from several Northern foundations. VEP is supporting 27 local registration campaigns across the South, a dozen more than last year. The Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), one organization getting VEP help, reports 56 staff members and full-time volunteers at work on Southern voting projects. Last summer it had only four.

The drives face much white resistance. In southwest Georgia, three Negro churches used for registration workshops were burned last winter. In Mississippi, VEP says it counted more than 30 acts of violence and intimidation against Negroes interested in registration between January 1961 and March 1963. Mississippi also publishes names of registration applicants; Negroes say this makes it easy for white employers to find and fire Negro workers who want to vote.

Even in areas where U.S. Justice Department surveillance has made whites wary of flagrant discrimination, subtle intimidation is still prevalent. "Negroes find it difficult to face white officials, especially unfriendly ones who call them 'girl' or 'boy,'" says a young registration leader in Savannah, Ga. "Sometimes, even though they know how to read the words in the literacy test, they stammer and are disqualified."

Deep-Rooted Apathy?

But more difficult to deal with than white obstructionism, is the apathy expressed by Mr. Miller, the Memphis Negro factory worker, and the fear registration formalities hold for poorly educated Negroes like Mrs. Mumphrea in Louisiana. Both attitudes are deeply rooted in the traditional position Southern society has reserved for the Negro, believe Donald R. Matthew and James W. Prothro, two University of North Carolina political scientists. In a recently published study on Negro voter registration, they wrote:

"Southern Negroes overwhelmingly possess low social status, relatively small incomes and limited education received in inferior schools. These attitudes are associated with low voter turnout among all populations. The low voting rates of Negroes in the South are, perhaps to a large extent, a result of these factors more than a consequence of direct political discrimination by the white community." Their conclusion: "A large, active and effective Negro electorate in the South may have to await a substantial social and economic change."

Negro strategists unwilling to wait that long increasingly believe there's a swifter chance for a big Negro vote in "good sized centers" where harassment is minimal and education and income higher.

Tennessee, which merely requires the reg-

Please Turn to Page 6, Column 2

Negro Voters: Dixie Registration Drives Meet Widespread Apathy

Continued From First Page

istrant to supply his name, address, occupation and birthday, signing with an "X" if illiterate, certainly would be a state to apply this formula. And, in fact, Negroes in Shelby County (Memphis) currently are registering at the rate of around 250 a week, double the white rate. Stimulating the rush is the Oct. 8 cutoff date for registration of voters for the November mayoral election in which segregationist incumbent Henry Loeb is an anticipated candidate.

But the number of Negroes registered still is likely only to return to the high of 78,000 reached in January. Since then, 6,000 Negroes have been removed from the registration rolls for failing to cast a ballot in any general election in the previous four years.

"There was a time when I could put 10,000 to 14,000 on the books in Memphis without any trouble," says W. C. Patton, field secretary for registration and voting of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People "Now we're down to the nitty-gritty, the hard core who've never been interested in politics. We have to do a better job."

Indifference in Atlanta

Lack of support also was the topic of a voter registration progress meeting the other evening in the Atlanta home of Mrs. Bessie Williams. With other volunteers, Mrs. Williams in canvassing the predominantly Negro Seventh Ward's Precinct 7-A as part of a drive by the All Citizens Registration Committee to raise Atlanta Negro registration to 75,000 by the year-end. So far, though, despite the help from radio announcements, the Committee has succeeded in nudging the total only to the 45,000 mark, still well below an estimated figure of 50,000 at the start of the year, and before several thousand were removed from the rolls for failure to vote in past elections.

"Everybody says what ought to be done, but when it comes time to cover the precinct, you don't see them," complains Mrs. Williams, a woman's dress factory employe by day. "We need 100 volunteers to do the job properly in our precinct. But we've only got 20—and you can see how many of those were interested in the meeting tonight," she adds, gesturing to the two workers seated in her living room.

In Rock Hill, S.C., only 13 persons attend a Herman Presbyterian Church workshop to teach applicants how to fill out registration forms. CORE representative Frank Robinson discovers seven are too young to qualify and the rest are already registered. Later he tells a visitor he and a few volunteers have called on 900 Negroes in surrounding York County, but have convinced only 100 to attempt registering. Only about 4,000 of York County's 11,000 voting age Negroes are now registered, against 20,000 of the county's 32,000 whites age 21 and over.

"Ideally, the church should have been filled," Mr. Robinson says. "But nine out of 10 people we talk to say the Negro has been voting for 20 years (since the U.S. Supreme Court ruled against the all-white primary) and they haven't seen it's done any good."

Short Hours

Mr. Robinson's work is further frustrated because in York as in many Southern rural counties, registration books are open only one day a month this year (three days a month in even-numbered years). Also, says Mr. Robinson, "the working people go to their jobs at 8 and the registrar opens at 9. They get off at 5 and the registrar closes at 5."

Similar problems face the Coordinating Council of Greater New Orleans. The council recently delivered a busload of Negroes to the Orleans Parish (county) registration office in mid-afternoon, only to have many turned away unregistered by the close of business. New Orleans has 17 registration clerks, one for each parish ward; registrar A. P. (Tim) Gallinghouse says it would "upset our registration procedure" to shift clerks to handle a rush of Negroes in a particular ward. He wants them to come in "two or three at a time."

"It would take a hundred years for people to get on the books at that rate," contends Irvin Daniel, the council's director of voter education. "And when they go back to their communities and tell how they've been treated, it discourages others."

New Orleans registration books close Nov. 6 for a hotly contested Louisiana governor's primary. Over the past four months, however, Mr. Daniel's organization has only succeeded in bringing some 1,000 applicants into registration offices. And only a third of these have been added to the roughly 35,000 Negroes on the rolls out of 130,000 of voting age.

Federal Action

Negro leaders think some of their problems could be solved by Federal Government actions. And evidence exists — in at least one of the 47 suits filed so far by the Justice Department to end discrimination against would-be Southern Negro voters — that the results can be dramatic.

In Alabama's Macon County (Tuskegee), where Negroes comprise nearly 85% of the population, a Federal judge in March 1961 ordered the Board of Registrars to cease discrimination. Since then, more than 2,000 Negroes have been added to the voter rolls, raising total Negro registration to about 3,800, outnumbering an estimated 2,900 registered whites.

A pending Justice Department suit being closely watched is against Mississippi and registrars in six of its counties. A hearing on this suit before a Federal judge is expected by next February in Jackson.

Mississippi now requires registrants to be of "good moral character," to fill out a four-page form of perfection, and to read and interpret any one of the state constitution's 285 sections. LeFlore County, which contains the city of Greenwood, recently disqualified an applicant because he couldn't explain section 65, which reads:

"All votes of the final passage of any measure shall be subject to reconsideration for at least one whole legislative day, and no motion to reconsider such vote shall be disposed of adversely on the day on which the original vote was taken, except on the last day of the session."

The Federal suit would make Mississippi return to the registration requirements of the 1890 state constitution. This demanded only that a voter meet age and residence stipulations, be able to read and not have been convicted of certain crimes. Justice Department lawyers believe a victory would speed Negro registration throughout the South, by showing Negroes registration barriers can be broken.

Rights Bill Impact

Proposals in the civil rights package before Congress, also would speed relief from discrimination, say Negro leaders. These include giving priority to voter registration suits; appointment of temporary voting referees while the suits are proceeding through the courts, and making a sixth grade education an automatic presumption of literacy. Any versions approved, however, are likely to be somewhat watered down.

Impatient with legal delays, some registration leaders are employing militant tactics to stir the voting ambitions of Negroes. During the recent Mississippi governor's primary an estimated 1,500 unregistered Negroes attempted to vote under an old statute which allows persons who believe they were "illegally denied registration" to cast ballots. The ballots were disregarded, but registration workers were encouraged by the number filled out.

Street demonstrations protesting voter discrimination have also been used to whip up registration enthusiasm. "We felt something was needed to make the town aware," says Charles Cobb, a Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee field secretary in Greenville, Miss., who led several lightly attended protest marches. "People now call us over to the front porch and at least attempt to talk with us."

But in at least two cases, Savannah and Albany, Ga., such protests may have interfered with registration. VEP funds have been cut off to projects in both cities because field workers became involved in demonstrations and boycotts.

OLEAN, N.Y.
TIMES HERALD
D. 17,589

SEP 16 1963

The Racial Situation At A Glance

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Birmingham, Ala.—Four killed and 23 injured as dynamite blasts Birmingham church Sunday. Within hours, two Negroes killed in shootings and three other persons wounded. Negro leaders and city officials plead against retaliation for the bombing which brought climax of horror to city's first week of school desegregation.

Anniston, Ala.—Angry crowd of white persons assaults two Negro ministers on steps of Anniston Public Library as the Negroes apparently attempted to desegregate the library. Reward of $1,000 offered for arrest of gang leaders who beat ministers.

Tallahassee, Fla.—Congress of Racial Equality discusses how to raise nearly $100,000 to release 214 persons from jail. Only seven of 248 arrested during Saturday night demonstrations have been able to post $500 bond each.

Farmville, Va.—Negro children return to school in Prince Edward County today for the first time since county officials closed public schools four years ago to avoid desegregation.

Albany, Ga. — Negro businessman Slater King seeking office of mayor. King, acting president of the integrationist Albany movement, qualified Saturday for the Oct. 15 election.

Atlanta—Economist Vivian W. Henderson says in study published by the Southern Regional Council that the South loses from $5 to $6 billion a year because of racial discrimination.

The Christian Science Mo
BOSTON, MASS.
WESTERN EDITION
D. 174,850

SEP 17 1963

Roundup Of Racial Disputes By States

By the Associated Press

While the focus of racial attention was on Birmingham, there were these other developments:

Alabama

At Anniston, a crowd of angry white persons assaulted two Negro ministers on the steps of the Anniston Public Library as they apparently attempted to desegregate it.

Police said one of the assailants used a chain in the attack on the Rev. Quintus Reynolds and the Rev. W. B. McClain. The ministers were members of a recently organized biracial committee to advise the city commission on social problems.

It was believed, police said, that the clergymen were planning to use the facilities of the white library. A $1,000 reward has been offered for the arrest of the leaders of the gang who beat the ministers.

Both were treated and released from a hospital.

Florida

At Tallahassee, the Congress of Racial Equality was discussing how to raise nearly $100,000 to release 241 persons from jail in the capital city.

Only 7 of 248 arrested during Saturday night demonstrations had been able to post $500 bonds each and gain their freedom.

County officials arrested 157 on charges of contempt of a circuit court injunction against demonstrations. Their bonds were fixed at $500 each.

After they were hauled off to jail, a band of Negroes from Florida A&M University marched to the jail, eight blocks away, to sing and shout. Ordered to disperse, they sat in the middle of the street and refused to move. Police arrested 91 on charges of disturbing the peace and bonds were set at $250 each.

Virginia

Negro children returned to school in Prince Edward County Monday for the first time since county officials closed public schools four years ago to avoid desegregation.

The children are attending a system of free private schools set up only a month ago at the urging of President Kennedy.

Trustees of the Prince Edward Free School Association expect between 1,200 and 1,600 Negro pupils to begin study by the end of the week.

Georgia

A Negro businessman at Albany is seeking the office of Mayor. Slater King, who is also acting president of the integrationist Albany movement, qualified Saturday for the Oct. 15 election.

Mr. King is one of three men seeking the office to be vacated by Mayor Asa D. Kelley Jr. Albany has been the scene of racial unrest, including massive arrests of Negroes during civil-rights demonstrations for the past two years.

An economist says the South loses from $5 to $6 billion a year because of racial discrimination.

In a study published by the Southern Regional Council, Vivian W. Henderson said that the nation was losing between $13 and $17 billion per year in national income through discrimination.

New York

In Malverne, a local branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People announced Monday it will urge an end to the student boycott of predominantly Negro elementary school in nearby Lakeview. Another civil-rights group said it will continue the boycott.

State Education Commissioner James E. Allen Jr. had urged that further demonstrations be called off as "deterimental to the best educational interests of the children."

The Lakeview branch of the NAACP said it had met and decided to urge an end to the school boycott until the racial-imbalance issue in the Malverne School District is settled in court. But the NAACP chapter said it would continue "other forms of protest demonstrations."

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
EASTERN EDITION
D. 174,850

SEP 19 1963

School Lag Binds Southern Negroes

By Bicknell Eubanks
Staff Correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor

Dallas

Efforts by Negroes to get a better education in Southern public schools are entangled inextricably with their lowly economic status as compared with that of white Southerners. In almost every phase, Negro workers find themselves at a disadvantage in competing for jobs because of inadequate training and education.

Southern employers who try to help alleviate the conditions of Negroes by making jobs available often find that there are not enough qualified applicants to fill the jobs. In many cases, these employers will report that they do not get a single Negro applicant. Such jobs as they make available range from semiskilled to white-collar work.

While the incomes of Negro families and individuals have increased more than five times nationally since the end of World War II, it is still only a little more than half of what the white wage earner makes. In the South, there is an even greater disparity. South of the Mason and Dixon Line, Negro income is less than half—only about 46 percent — of what white workers earn.

Why School Drive?

This and other factors are cited by a Fisk University economist as one of the reasons why Negroes have stepped up "their efforts to speed school desegregation, which, in large part, derives from efforts to secure a better break economically."

The economist is Dr. Vivian Henderson, who is chairman of the department of economics and business administration at Fisk University in Nashville, Tenn. The results of Dr. Henderson's study have been published by the Southern Regional Council of Atlanta, a bipartisan organization of white and Negro Southerners organized in 1944 to advance equal opportunity for all Southerners.

Dr. Henderson cautions that unless Negroes get a better break on the job market, the South's unprecedented economic expansion may get a major setback.

Basic Question Cited

He concludes that the South "loses from five to six billion dollars annually because of racial discrimination. He warns that if the South expects to make continued economic progress, it must make "rapid racial adjustments."

Dr. Henderson found that Negroes had taken little part in the growth phases of the South's economic advances.

"While it cannot be denied that important change has occurred in the economic status of Negroes during the past 20 years, critical questions must be considered regarding the rapidity of this change," Dr. Henderson said.

"Basically the question facing the nation, the South, and Negroes today is whether Negroes are narrowing the gaps in their economic status. The issue is not whether Negroes have been making progress, but whether it has been rapid enough to enable them to adjust to an economy whose rate of change is cumulative and intense."

Negro leaders across the South point out that the traditional Southern system of "last hired, first fired" still prevails.
vails. This is borne out at state employment offices, where Negroes will be waiting long after white jobless applicants have been given work.

It is pointed out that while employment has increased in general among Negroes, their total unemployment is about twice that of white workers.

Dr. Henderson reports that Negroes are still concentrated in jobs of the lowest categoires, with limited mobility and a high vulnerability to cyclical fluctuations and adverse consequences of technological changes.

JUNIOR SCHOLASTIC
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 1,389,932

SEP 2 0 1963

Scholastic Teacher

VOL. 53, NO. 2, SEPT. 20, 1963 • EDITION OF JUNIOR SCHOLASTIC

SPECIAL REPORT

Integration North and South

NINE YEARS after the Supreme Court decision on school desegregation, the focus was shifting perceptibly from the South to the North. Though specific incidents in the South were being widely publicized (such as James Meredith's graduation from the Univ. of Mississippi and the re-opening of schools on a privately-financed basis to Negroes in Prince Edward County, Va.), more and more attention was being focused on the de facto segregation of schools in the Northeast, the Midwest, and the Far West. In these areas, school superintendents were reconsidering the American institution known as the neighborhood school.

▶In the South: Last month, the Southern School News reported that 113 public school districts in the Southern and border regions would begin desegregating this fall. This was said to be "the largest number of districts to drop racial barriers in any year since 1956." Of 3,053 districts with both white and Negro students in the area, 1,092 will thus be desegregated.

Of the 113 new districts, 95 are desegregating voluntarily while 18 are under court orders. Forty-seven Texas districts will desegregate; in Virginia, 23; Kentucky, 16; North Carolina, 11; Tennessee, six; Florida, five; Alabama, 2; Arkansas, Georgia, and Louisiana, one apiece. Major cities under orders to desegregate: Birmingham and Mobile, Ala. (This is the first year that Alabama will desegregate below the college level.)

Desegregation methods vary. Many districts will desegregate at the rate of a grade a year, starting at the kindergarten level. Others will start at the high school level and work downward. In some areas, all-Negro schools are being closed down, with Negroes transferred to previously all-white schools. In Virginia, the State's Pupil Placement Board assigned several hundred Negro students to biracial classes in 21 school districts throughout the state.

In Virginia's Prince Edward County, schools will reopen for Negro students. For four years the county's public schools have been closed. (They were shut down in 1959 after receiving court orders to integrate.) Whites have been attending private segregated schools. Negroes have either done without any schooling, or have received makeshift attention from volunteer teachers. Now a private group is being set up in Prince Edward with the support of local, state, and Federal authorities.

It will operate private, integrated schools whose initial task will be remedial education. Public school buildings, now unused, will be leased from the county. Private contributions are being solicited, and the National Education Association has invited its members to contribute.

▶In the North: The problem of de facto segregation is troubling school superintendents in the major cities of the North, and in many of its suburban communities as well.

The problem is basically that a school's population tends to reflect the racial composition of its surrounding neighborhood. A school in a Negro area will tend to have a high proportion of Negroes. Similarly, a school in a white neighborhood will have a high proportion of whites.

School boards have experimented with a number of possible solutions. [See chart below.] These include redrawing school district lines, "open enrollment" (allowing Negro pupils to attend white schools in other districts), and setting up schools where both white and Negro pupils attend specific grade levels. One of the most contro-

SIX METHODS OF DESEGREGATION

Scholastic Teacher chart

These are six methods of desegregation currently under development or study in various communities. Redistricting involves the redrawing of school district lines to correct racial imbalance. Under open enrollment, Negroes are allowed to enroll in formerly white schools. The highly controversial "open enrollment in reverse" would assign white pupils to Negro schools. The Princeton Plan calls for specified schools to handle both white and Negro pupils in specified grades. School recombination may be handled in various ways, but the idea is to convert the Negro school into some special school (perhaps for the retarded) and transfer Negro pupils to other schools. New school spotting involves planning to build new schools in areas where housing is already integrated.

You don't need a crystal ball — to dream up a successful BOOK BAZAAR

Let the new Fall 1963 Scholastic Teacher Book Bazaar Kit show you how to:

- stimulate your students' interest in books
- raise money to buy books for your school library
- increase the number of books on your classroom bookshelves
- encourage your students to build home libraries

Order Scholastic Teachers' Book Bazaar Kit now and receive: a Manual on how to conduct and promote a book bazaar; 2 radio or play scripts; 3 wall posters; streamer letters spelling Book Bazaar; recommended new book lists; list of book suppliers, and new Fall book jackets. Price of complete kit—$2.50. Items in kit may also be purchased individually. See coupon below for prices. Be sure to fill in your name and the address to which you want materials shipped.

Enclose remittance or school purchase order with instructions on how we are to bill for materials ordered.

Scholastic Teacher does not supply books for bazaars — these may be secured from your local distributor or regional supplier. However, Scholastic Book Services this year introduces a paperback Book Fair service. For full information write directly to: Scholastic Book Services, 904 Sylvan Ave., Englewood Cliffs, N. J.

Book Bazaars
Scholastic Teacher
50 W. 44 St., New York 36, N. Y.

PLEASE PRINT LEGIBLY.

Please send me the Book Bazaar materials checked below.
I enclose $_____.

_____ The new Fall 1963, Book Bazaar packet (which includes 2 scripts, Manual on how to conduct and promote a Book Bazaar, 3 wall posters, streamer letters spelling Book Bazaar, recommended new book lists, list of book suppliers, and new book jackets) @ $2.50.
_____ The Jumbo packet of 50 new book jackets for display purposes; recommended book lists and list of book suppliers @ $1.00.
_____ Manual on how to conduct and promote a Book Bazaar @ 50¢.
_____ "Magic Carpet" wall display poster (43" x 33") @ 25¢.
_____ "Family Book Parade" wall display poster (43" x 33") @ 25¢.
_____ "Put Reading Into Orbit" streamer poster (9½" x 30") @ 25¢.
_____ "Adventures in Bookland" script by Florence Liss (Grades 4-8) @ 25¢.
_____ "Happy Among Books" script by Jean A. Eicks (Jr. Sr. H. S.) @ 25¢.
_____ Cardboard letters spelling Book Bazaar for wall or over-door display @ 50¢.

Signed _____ Title _____ School _____ Address _____
City _____ State _____

Please accompany orders with check or money orders.

Sept. 20, 1963
Good for 3 months only versial proposals has been labeled "open enrollment in reverse," where white pupils in white neighborhoods are assigned to Negro schools in Negro areas. This was suggested by a Conference on Integration in the New York City Public Schools last spring. Major civic organizations have disavowed the proposal on the grounds that it would hasten the exodus of the white middle class from the city, as has been happening in Washington, D.C.

Elsewhere, Negro demonstrations against de facto segregation go on. In Chicago, demonstrators broke through police lines and hurled themselves in front of bulldozers to prevent the construction of mobile classrooms at Negro school sites. The Chicago school board later voted 8-2 to have the construction proceed.

In Malverne, Long Island, N.Y., the school board was ordered by State Education Commissioner James E. Allen, Jr., to correct racial imbalance in its schools. At the same time Allen asked all school districts in the state to report on racial imbalance and indicate how they plan to end it. He defined racial imbalance "for the purpose of this report" as being 50 per cent or more non-white.

In New Jersey, State Commissioner Frederick M. Raubinger ordered state school aid withheld from the Orange school system until racial imbalance was ended in the Oakwood school. Meanwhile plans were being made to end racial imbalance at the Lincoln School in Englewood, N.J.

In Detroit, a history supplement has been added to give eighth grade students an understanding of the role of the Negro in U.S. history. The supplement was prepared after the NAACP criticized the current text for allegedly presenting the Negro as a "dependent, servile creature."

In Los Angeles, there were a number of demonstrations for (and against) school integration by such organizations as the Congress of Racial Equality, the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, and assorted other groups.

As the desegregation struggle continued, Dr. Robert Coles issued A Psychiatric Study of the Desegregation of Southern Schools. In a 25-page report issued by the Southern Regional Council and the Anti-Defamation League, Coles found that integration appeared easier when started in the lower grades:

"Together at six," writes Coles, "is not like being together at 16, regardless of all the other factors. Young children of the two races play together and work together even though they have heard many remarks at home which might discourage this. . .

(Continued on page 4-T)

(Continued from page 2-T)

". . . Adolescents worry deeply about what others think because they are so unsure of what they themselves think, or who they are. Each fears the ostracism of the other, because each trembles at himself and with himself in those uncertain years. . . ."

A plea for equal educational opportunity came from President Kennedy in an address to the nation: ". . . The Negro baby born in America today, regardless of the section or the state in which he is born, has about one-half as much chance of completing high school as a white baby, born in the same place, on the same day; one-third as much chance of completing college; one-third as much chance of becoming a professional man; twice as much chance of becoming unemployed; about one-seventh as much chance of earning $10,000 a year; a life expectancy which is seven years shorter and the prospects of earning only half as much. . . .

". . . Not every child has an equal talent or an equal ability or equal motivation. But they should have the equal right to develop their talent and their ability and their motivation to make something of themselves. . . ."

President Kennedy backed a Civil Rights Bill to eliminate discrimination against citizens based on race, color, or national origin, in voting, education, and public accommodations.

The Federal government has already backed integration in rules governing apprenticeship training programs and in school attendance of children of

KNOXVILLE, TENN.
JOURNAL
D: 64,670

SEP 21 1963

Atlanta U Prexy To Be Speaker At KC Opening

Dr. Rufus E. Clement, president of Atlanta University since 1937, will be speaker at Knoxville College's opening convocation at 11 a. m. next Wednesday in Griffen - Alumni Auditorium.

DR. CLEMENT

Dr. James A. Colston, KC president, will preside and introduce Dr. Clement. Honor students will be recognized.

Dr. Clement is a native of Salisbury, N.C. He was graduated with highest honors from Livingston College, received his DD from Garrett Bibical Institute and his masters and PhD from Northwestern University in 1930. He has received numerous awards and taught at several colleges and schools.

He has an honorary degree from University of Liberia.

Dr. Clement has been a member of the Atlanta Board of Education since 1954 and is a member of the board of American Association for United Nation, United Negro College Fund, Atlanta Urban League, Southern Regional Council and Citizen's Trust Co. of Atlanta.

TAMPA, FLA.
FLORIDA SENTINEL
BULLETIN (N)
TUES. 11,100 FRI. 6,311
SEP 21 1963

Discrimination Held Costing Dixie Billions

ATLANTA — An economist says that rapid racial adjustments are vitally important to the economic health of the South, a region which is losing from $5 to $6 billion a year because of discrimination.

In a study published Sunday by the Southern Regional Council, Vivian W. Henderson said that "tensions generated by poor race relations are not conducive to economic growth."

"Chaos over school desegregation, boycotts to achieve employment opportunity, sit-in demonstrations, and picket lines all are simply and tragically inimical to the economic life of the region," he said, adding:

"Positive steps toward good race relations, the full obsorption of Negroes into the mainstream of the region—these are imperative to leadership seeking a healthy South."

Henderson is professor and chairman of the department of economics and business administration at Fisk University. At present he is serving as a visiting professor at North Carolina State College in Raleigh.

He said that based on figures provided by the President's Council of Economic Advisers in 1962, " a conservative estimate is that the South loses from $5 to $6 billion annually because of racial discrimination."

The South can no longer afford the luxury of wasting a valuable human resource," said Henderson.

"To achieve full equality with other regions of the nation, the South must achieve full utilization of its manpower," he said.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 298,174

SEP 21 1963

While School Keeps

9649

SCHOOL DESEGREGATION in the South moved a trifle faster this fall as 140 school districts dropped racial barriers for the first time. This is the largest number to desegregate in any year since 1956, according to the Southern School News, official publication of the Southern Education Reporting Service. The pace of change is still slow, but appears more clearly inexorable even to the most reluctant Southerner. Districts were desegregated in Alabama and South Carolina for the first time—leaving Mississippi as the only state with its public elementary and secondary schools wholly segregated. And, in other states, desegregation is moving into "hard core" areas of racial sentiment without apparent difficulty.

There are 6,197 school districts in the seventeen-state Southern and border-state region. Of these, about half (3,053) are biracial — having both Negro and white pupils. About 37 per cent of the biracial districts (1,119) have desegregated. But a far smaller percentage of Negro children in these districts is actually in schools with white children.

It may be encouraging that 119 of the 140 districts that desegregated this fall did so voluntarily; only twenty-one were under court order.

Voluntary desegregation does not mean, of course, that a community is willing to drop racial bars any farther than necessary. As court cases have gradually eliminated the possibilities for evasion of the Supreme Court's 1954 decision, the more sophisticated opponents of desegregation have recognized that change is inevitable. They have also seen that communities that indulged in an emotional, last-ditch massive resistance fight to avoid integration finally had to submit to a court-ordered desegregation plan that often went farther and faster than court-approved plans developed by the communities themselves. Therefore, voluntary desegregation has become one means by which local communities can control the pace of change and limit the degree to which racial barriers are lowered.

An instructive analysis of the means that have been proposed to control and limit desegregation is contained in a twenty-eight page pamphlet published jointly by the Southern Regional Council (5 Forsyth Street, N.W., Atlanta 3, Georgia) and the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith (515 Madison Avenue, New York 22, N.Y.). Titled "Token Desegregation and Beyond," by J. Kenneth Morland, professor of sociology, Randolph-Macon Woman's College, Lynchburg, Virginia, the pamphlet describes the various methods used to slow desegregation, the developing attitudes of federal courts toward these methods, the costs of desegregation, and one point of view on what the future holds. Copies are available from either of the sponsoring organizations for fifty cents.

STATUS OF SOUTHERN SCHOOL DESEGREGATION
(As of September 1, 1963)

State	Total Districts	Number Biracial	Desegregating This Fall: Number of Districts	Voluntary	Court-Ordered	Previously Desegregated	Total Desegregated
Alabama	114	114	4	0	4	0	4
Arkansas	416	228	1	1	0	12	13
Delaware	87	87	0	0	0	87	87
Dist. of Columbia	1	1	0	0	0	1	1
Florida	67	67	5	3	2	10	15
Georgia	198	182	3	2	1	1	4
Kentucky	205	166	16	14	2	149	165
Louisiana	67	67	1	0	1	1	2
Maryland	24	23	0	0	0	23	23
Mississippi	150	150	0	0	0	0	0
Missouri	1,607	213	0	0	0	203 (Est.)	203 (Est.)
North Carolina	173	173	21	21	0	18	39
Oklahoma	1,180	241	0	0	0	196	196
South Carolina	108	108	1	0	1	0	1
Tennessee	154	143	10	10	0	26	36
Texas	1,461	919	55	46	9	177	232
Virginia	130	128	23	22	1	32	55
West Virginia	55	43	0	0	0	43	43
TOTALS	6,197	3,053	140	119	21	979	1,119

—Southern Education Reporting Service

Desegregation poses enormous problems—both educational and social—for Negroes and whites alike. And each state is meeting the challenge of change in its own way, within its own cultural traditions. Alabama and Mississippi have been the scenes of bitter violence in the course of the last year as Negroes sought to achieve, in fact, the equality of opportunity that was so dearly won in theory a hundred years ago. But South Carolina, despite its Deep South traditions, has quietly enrolled eleven Negro children in the elementary and secondary schools of Charleston, just as it last year enrolled the first Negro in the state college at Clemson. The men who influence state policy there will allow desegregation to proceed not one whit faster than necessity demands. But neither are they likely to countenance the barbarism of violence.

Change is bound to be slow in many parts of the South. But it may be hopeful that voluntary desegregation is becoming the rule rather than the exception in some areas of the South, whatever the motivation for it, because in almost every case to date, once Negroes have been admitted to white schools, the number admitted has increased year by year.

RECRUITING HIGH SCHOOL SCHOLARS on a nationwide basis through offers of tangible benefits—such as money—is a relatively new departure for colleges and universities. Institutions of higher learning have long competed for high school football stars, each attempting to outdo the other in the "educational" advantages offered. But only very recently has the mental man become as valuable as the muscle man in the contribution he can make to the institution's public and professional image. The movement for academic excellence may be coming of age.

In the course of the past year a number of colleges and universities have turned over some of their own scholarship funds to the National Merit Scholarship Corporation in order to assure themselves of minimum representation from that elite pool of freshman talent, the National Merit Scholars. Institutions using this means to help raise the academic level of their student bodies range from tiny Bennington in Vermont (350 women) to huge Michigan State (21,000 undergraduates), to small Ripon College in Wisconsin (700 men and women). Each will benefit and more schools will probably follow their lead.

Other institutions are seeking the same objective through individual programs of their own. The University of Southern California, for instance, launched a nationwide search last spring "for exceptionally gifted high school seniors" to become the university's first ten Trustee Scholars. Ten more will be selected each year; those who need financial aid will receive up to $2,500 a year and will retain their designation as long as their academic work holds up. In explaining the new program, USC's president, Dr. Norman Topping said, "The keen minds of Trustee Scholars will be a benefit and an inspiration to all who study here."

New York University, the nation's largest private institution of higher learning, is initiating a similar program this fall with the selection of fifty-five incoming freshmen of outstanding ability to be New York University Scholars. Scholars will attend special seminars, colloquia, and meetings with faculty advisors and distinguished campus guests will be arranged for them. A special effort will also be made to help them become acquainted with the vast cultural resources of New York City. They will receive up to $12,000 in financial aid over the four years of study. NYU is also seeking through this program, which within four years will include 150 to 200 University Scholars, to increase the proportion of students from other areas of the country.

THE NATURAL HISTORY PRESS, a new publishing venture, brings together the resources of one of the nation's great museums and a major publishing house to develop new science materials for students—and adults. A joint undertaking of the American Museum of Natural History and the Doubleday publishing house, the new press is launching this month a new book series, to be known as American Museum Science Books, for students and interested adults, and a new science magazine for upper elementary students in the nine-to-fourteen age group called Nature and Science. This collaboration of scholars and publishers promises science materials of unusual quality and interest.

First offerings in the new series of American Museum Science Books, are four paperbacks: Exploration of the Moon, by Franklyn M. Branley; Biology of Birds, by Wesley E. Lanyon; Indians of the Northwest Coast, by Philip Drucker; and Indians of the Plains, by Robert H. Lowie; and one cloth-bound volume, Wasp Farm, by Howard Ensign Evans. The two volumes on the American Indian were originally published in the Anthropological Handbook Series of the museum; the other volumes are being published for the first time. Prices of the paperbacks range from ninety-five cents to $1.95; Wasp Farm is $3.95.

Nature and Science, the new magazine for the elementary grades, is a sixteen-page illustrated periodical that will appear fortnightly during the school year and offer special monthly issues during the summer. It provides articles on the physical and biological sciences, mathematical and scientific games, projects for the young scientist to pursue, and explanations of how common mechanical objects work (in the first issue, for instance, drawings and text show the inner workings of a water faucet). Subscriptions are available from the magazine, Garden City, N.Y., at $2.70 a year (eighteen issues), special prices for quantity orders for classroom use and for the teacher's edition.

AUTOMATION IN EDUCATION takes many forms and serves a variety of purposes. Northeastern University in Boston, for instance, has used new data processing equipment to put alumni giving on an installment basis. Designed to do the usual job of providing fast and accurate handling of student records, examinations, and payrolls, the equipment also makes possible a fund-raising program that allows alumni to pledge as little as $100 to be paid at the rate of $5 a month for twenty months. Many alumni are able to give substantially more each year in this way than when they sent a single, annual check. But keeping track of a large number of monthly gifts over an extended period without data processing equipment, the university notes, "would have required a small army of clerical help."

NEGRO GRADUATE STUDENTS represent a disproportionately small percentage of the total according to Chancellor Franklin D. Murphy of the University of California at Los Angeles. Yet, he says, "If the number of Negroes entering university teaching and research is to be increased, the process must begin by expanding the enrollment of qualified Negroes at the graduate level." Therefore, UCLA has launched a drive to find qualified prospects within the university's undergraduate student body, and plans are being made to extend the search to high schools, junior colleges, and the California state colleges. The effort is complicated by the fact that no records are kept of students by race and no fellowship funds are available specifically for Negroes. However, prospective students will be given the benefit of special counseling about professional career goals and information concerning the opportunities available.

PEACE CORPS VOLUNTEERS, when they return from their two-year tour of duty overseas, bring with them knowledge and experience that promise to be uniquely valuable in a shrinking world of rapid social change. But only a fraction of the potential benefit that both society and the volunteers themselves might reap from their experience will be realized if the pay-off is left to chance. Therefore, the American Council on Education, under a grant from the Carnegie Corporation, has set up the Peace Corps Volunteer Career Information Service (700 Jackson Place, Washington, D.C.) to seek out employment and educational opportunities for returning volunteers, provide a career-counseling service, and keep a record of what happens to volunteers in the years following their overseas experience.

Some 700 volunteers will have completed their two-year tour of duty by the end of 1963. To date more than forty colleges, universities, and foundations have already offered scholarships and fellowships in a variety of fields. More are needed and will doubtless become available as awareness of the need grows.

Meanwhile, the success of early volunteers in their assignments abroad is indicated by the announcement that the Peace Corps estimates it will need at least 5,000 teachers during the next twelve months to meet the requests coming in from the forty-seven countries throughout Latin America, Africa, and Asia where it now has educational projects. Teachers are needed at every level from elementary school through college—for all subjects usually taught in American schools. Greatest demand, however, is in mathematics, science, English as a second language, vocational subjects, and physical education. Physically fit teachers who are retiring or who are eligible for a leave of absence may apply. Further information is available from the Peace Corps, Division of Recruiting, Washington 25, D.C. Applicants should indicate whether they are retired or plan to take a leave of absence, and should also note their teaching field. —JAMES CASS.

AMERICUS, GA.
TIMES-RECORDER
D. 4,451

SEP 23 1963

Economist Says Dixie Losing $5 Billion Yearly

ATLANTA (AP)—An economist says that rapid racial adjustments are vitally important to the economic health of the South, a region which is losing from $5 to $6 billion a year because of discrimination.

In a study released this week by the Southern Regional Council, Vivian W. Henderson said that "tensions generated by poor race relations are not conducive to economic growth."

"Chaos over school desegregation, boycotts to achieve employment opportunity, sit-in demonstrations, and picket lines, all are simply and tragically inimical to economic life of the region" he said, adding:

"Positive steps toward good race relations, the full absorption of Negroes into the mainstream of the region these are imperative to leadership seeking a healthy South."

Henderson is professor and chairman of the department of economics and business administration at Fisk University. At present he is serving as a visiting professor at North Carolina State College in Raleigh.

He said that based on figures provided by the President's Council of Economic Advisers in 1962, "a conservative estimate is that the South loses from $5 to $6 billion annually because of racial discrimination."

"The South can no longer afford the luxury of wasting a valuable human resource," said Henderson.

"To achieve full equality with other regions of the nation, the South must achieve full utilization of its manpower," he said. "For the nation as a whole, the continuing struggle of the cold war makes the full use of America's human resources imperative."

The Southern Regional Council was formed in 1944 by Negro and white Southerners to advance "equal opportunity for all the South's people."

MONROE, LA.
WORLD
D. 27,587 S. 41,061

SEP 23 1963

DE FACTO SEGREGATION

School Report Notes Low Integration

ATLANTA (UPI) — A new report on the progress of school desegregation said Saturday that fewer than one out of 200 Negro children in 11 Southern states are now in integrated classes.

The report, published by Southern Regional Council and the Anti-Defamation League, was prepared by J. Kenneth Morland, professor of sociology at Randolph-Macon woman's college, Lynchburg, Va.

The report said the 11 "resistant" states had adopted token integration plans designed "to meet the demands of the Supreme court by allowing some integration while still keeping the number of Negroes in school with whites at such a low level as to maintain de facto (in fact) segregation."

Morland listed pupil placement laws, local option provisions with their school closing authorizations, transfer plans as the main programs that have kept 99.6 per cent of the Negroes in schools of the 11 states in segregated classes.

Morland singled out as the "resistant" states Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

Previously - segregated areas that have "complied" with the 1954 Supreme Court school desegregation decision were listed as Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, Oklahoma, West Virginia and the District of Columbia.

Morland pointed out that overall school desegregation statistics fail to show the slow pace in the deep South and in some cases hide the facts inside the South.

He noted that statistics show Nashville, Tenn., with 810 Negroes in schools with whites but that actually 540 of them were in a school with a single white child and a Chinese-American.

Of the 270 desegregated districts in the "resistant" states last fall, 176 were in Texas alone, he said.

"Racial integratoin in public schools is by any standard at token levels in resistant states, where 98 per cent of the Negro pupils in desegregated districts and 99.6 per cent in all school schools," Morland concluded.

The federal courts "are not going to permit the continuation of racial schools," Morland emphasized. He said de facto segregation would be "futile in the long run" and very costly.

On the basis of a Civil Rights Commission estimate that one racial case costs $15,000, Morland estimated that litigation over the issue already had cost $4,395,000. There have been 223 cases in "resistant" states and 70 in the others.

He said that fear of social troubles and lowering of academic standards governed much of the reluctance to move into integrated programs.

NEGRO DIGEST
CHICAGO, ILL.
MONTHLY - CIRC.N.AVAIL.

SEP 24 1963

Keeping the Record Straight

Mr. Morsell Replies to Mr. Lomax

BY JOHN A. MORSELL

Assistant to the Executive Secretary, NAACP

Editor's Note: In the December 1962 issue of NEGRO DIGEST, we reprinted from The Crisis a review by John A. Morsell, Roy Wilkins' assistant, of Louis E. Lomax's book The Negro Revolt. Mr. Lomax later suggested that he be granted space to reply to the article, and the essay, "A Challenge to Negro Leaders: Do Your Job or Get Out of the Way," which appeared in the July 1963 NEGRO DIGEST was the result. The following article was written by Mr. Morsell in response to the article by Mr. Lomax.

The fundamental appeal in my review of Lomax's book, The Negro Revolt, was for adherence to simple canons of truthfulness and accuracy in reporting. The Negro Revolt erred grievously and profusely in this regard, and my review took sharp note of a number of serious misstatements and distortions. It also noted a number of what I called "unnecessary, if minor, errata," which I attributed to editorial laxity on the part of the publishers. I agree with Lomax that his business is writing books, not editing them, and my reference to these errors made this plain.

(I must add, however, that most authors whom I know cannot forbear a final peep at the galleyproofs, in the expectation that some mistakes may have slipped in and in the hope that what comes out over their names will be as near perfect as possible.)

Lomax is quite mistaken, incidentally, in assuming that I was "assigned" to write that review. I had an advance copy of the book and was thus the first person on our staff to read it. It appalled and outraged me, and I wrote the review on my own. The review has evidently appalled and outraged Lomax, but his reaction would be more soundly based if he showed any sign of having read it with care. He misquotes a reference to himself, for example, as "a self-asserted NAACP board member." But this is not what I wrote: the actual text was "self-assertedly an active member," and its purpose was to express surprise that, under those circumstances, he should be so ignorant of what the NAACP does. I am no longer so charitable, however: I think Lomax does know, but that for reasons of his own he prefers to ignore it.

Lomax's account of the NAACP's participation in the Southern Regional Council's Voter Education Project is typically garbled. It was expected and desired that the Association, having the most experience in voter registration work, should contribute heavily to the design and structure of the project. To this end, a careful evaluation of the prospectus was made by several of our staff executives, and many of the suggestions they offered were subsequently incorporated into the VEP plan. No final commitment could be made except by vote of our Board of Directors. The plan was not far enough advanced to permit this at the April, 1961, policy meeting and it was therefore considered at the next policy meeting in September, 1961. There was no delay, intentional or otherwise, and Lomax's fictitious quotation from an unidentified Board member is gratuitous.

Incidentally, Lomax professed at the time to believe that huge sums of money were instantly at hand, and were being kept out of useful circulation only by NAACP procrastination. He was also wrong as to the amounts involved (they were less than he claimed) but, being in honor bound by the sponsors to refrain from any public comment, we could not speak freely about this or other aspects. (The sponsors, be it noted, were perturbed as we were over Lomax's premature radio broadcast, which they regarded as mischievous and irresponsible.) In point of fact, it took from September, 1961 until March, 1962 to obtain a ruling from the Treasury Department which would permit the VEP funds to be channeled to the NAACP and others who do not enjoy the right to receive tax-exempt money.

It would be unfortunate in the extreme if criticism of the NAACP were "frightened off" as Lomax suggests. Continuous criticism is important; one would hope it could be constructive (even from Lomax), but any kind is better than none at all. At the same time, it seems to me, the critics should adopt the same attitude and be prepared for counter-criticism, for correction and for refutation, where these are in order. This is the essence of healthy debate, and it is not helped when give-and-take is interpreted as invidious personal attack. A thick skin is still an important requirement for those who would be involved in controversy.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
DEFENDER
W.-CIRC.N.AVAIL.

SEP 2 4 1963

Political Hot Sheet

by Jim Miller

The big split in the 26th ward between Committeeman Norman Seay and Alderman William L. Clay has hit the daily press as if it was just beginning to be news. The Negro community has known this all along. Adherents of Ald. Clay have accused Seay of joining hands with the Dwyer-led Negro democrats whose chief lieutenants in the mid-town area are Fred Weathers and Senator T. D. McNeal.

Only 55 complaints have been filed under the Missouri fair employment practices law since it became law two years ago. Most people denied employment because of racial bias think the lodging of a complaint with the state agency would be an exercise in futility.

The race for governor of Missouri is taking on the aspects of a free-for-all. This would be made to order for old line Uncle Tom Negro politicians working for the re-election of white committeemen in all-Negro wards in the mid-town district.

Negro voter registration shows widespread gains in the South in spite of the hardcore indifference which the registration campaign has encountered. The Southern Regional Council, an Atlanta-baseed, bi-racial group, recently estimated that only 30% of the South's Negro voting-age population is registered to vote. Extreme apathy on the part of the Negro is matched only by the stubborn opposition of entrenched, Southern white supremacists.

The democratic primary election of 1964 has gotten off to a "fighting start" penmanship style, that is: Bitter partisan followers of the Fred Weathers camp have been accused of writing uncle Tom letters to the daily press sagagely attacking Alderman Wm. Clay.

The Virginian-Pilot
NORFOLK, VA.
D. 119,187

SEP 25 1963

Waste in the South

Much of Dr. Vivian W. Henderson's study of Negro income and employment is a reminder rather than a revelation, but it is not less valuable for that. In fact, his report has a significance broader than the title—The Economic Status of Negroes in the Nation and in the South—would indicate.

In his pamphlet, published by the Southern Regional Council, the Fisk University economist surveys not only Negro employment and income, but also the Southern economy in comparison to that of the rest of the nation.

His unsurprising conclusion is that the South, with relation to the rest of the nation, is much like the Negro with relation to the white: better off than ever, but still losing ground. There is a "dollar gap" between Southern and national income, just as there is between Negro and white earnings. And in both cases it is widening, despite the fact that both the South and the Negro have made enormous gains during the last two decades.

Lest it be hastily concluded that the Southern Negro's economic plight is entirely responsible for his region's poor showing, Dr. Henderson cites figures showing that the Southern white is running well behind his Northern and Western counterparts in economic gains. Indeed, Negroes in the Western states rose faster in income during the 'Fifties than did whites in the South, and the median incomes of the two groups are now almost identical.

* * *

Of course personal income is not in itself a conclusive economic indicator. But it measures what people can get out of an economy and is therefore an excellent index of prosperity. The indication from Dr. Henderson's figures is that while the historic poverty of the South has been alleviated, the region has not yet experienced enough economic growth to be a full participant in national prosperity.

Dr. Henderson sees "traditional race relations" in the South as a major barrier to economic progress. He cites the waste of Negro manpower, the exodus of Negro talent to centers of greater opportunity. Failure to rectify the economic inequalities in the South, he suggests, can only mean a continuing tide of Negroes moving from rural shacks to city welfare rolls.

The truism about "many Souths" is pertinent here. Neither the spectacular poverty of the Appalachian fastness nor the glistening prosperity of downtown Houston or Atlanta is wholly representative of the region.

In hamlets and rural counties across much of the South, manpower of both races is cruelly wasted, and it is from these places that the greatest exodus of manpower is taking place. It is these places whose stagnation erodes the tax base of their states, putting wholly unfair burdens on the still-germinating prosperity of the metropolitan centers. And it is these places, where inadequate education breeds ignorance and prejudice, that swell the pluralities of the Wallaces and Barnetts who are hobbling the South's steps toward progress.

MEMPHIS, TENN.
TRI-STATE DEFENDER
W 24,000
PAGE ONE CERTIFIED (N)
SEP 28 1963

'South Loses $6 Billion Annually Because of Bias'

The need of Negro Americans, and particularly of Negro Southerners, for more and better jobs is underscored by economist Vivian W. Henderson in a short study, The Economic Status of the Negro: In the Nation and In the South, published recently by the Southern Regional Council.

Henderson is professor and chairman of the department of economics and business administration at Fisk university. He is currently serving as a visiting professor at North Carolina State college in Raleigh.

Despite gains made since World War II, Dr. Henderson finds "little cause for optimism regarding rapid change in the status of Negroes in the near future."

"Tensions generated by poor race relations are not conducive to economic growth," Henderson also warns. "Chaos over school desegregation, boycotts to achieve employment opportunity, sit-in demonstrations, and picket lines, all are simply and tragically inimical to the economic life of the region. Positive steps toward good race relations, the full absorption of Negroes into the mainstream of the region—these are imperative to leadership seeking a healthy South," said Henderson.

While the income of Negro families and individuals nationally has grown over five times since 1940, it's still "little more than one-half" that of American white families and individuals.

Moreover, Dr. Henderson points out, "in the South Negro families have an income of less than one-half (46%) that of white families and only one-half the income" of non-southern Negroes.

This fact, says Henderson, explains "why Negroes have stepped up their efforts to speed school segregation, which, in large part, derives from efforts to secure a better break economically."

The proportion of Negro families with incomes between $4,000 and $6,000 tripled between 1941 and 1961, and the number of Negro families with incomes of more than $6,000 grew from 4% to 20% during the same period.

But the Henderson study shows that these gains occurred between 1940 and 1954. Since that time, the income gap between Negroes and whites has widened.

"Negroes are losing ground rapidly in gaining dollar parity with whites," according to Dr. Henderson, and "earnings are increasing for whites at a faster pace than for Negroes."

With unemployment among Negroes today twice that of whites and the duration of unemployment longer for Negroes than for whites, Dr. Henderson notes that the industries which have "a declining rate of employment are the industries which have absorbed Negroes." These include mining, manufacturing, and construction, where Negroes have found unskilled and semi-skilled jobs as laborers and operatives.

"There has not been a large penetration by Negroes into the growth sectors of employment. Those industries and occupations where Negroes have gained in employment represent the slow growth areas of the economy and labor market."

In discussing the losses to the national economy through racial discrimination, Dr. Henderson concludes, extrapolating from government estimates, that "the South loses from $5 to $6 billion annually because of racial discrimination."

Accordingly, the economist warns that "rapid racial adjustments" must be made by the South if it expects to enjoy continued economic progress.

The Southern Regional Council is an organization of white and Negro Southerners formed in 1944 to advance "equal opportunity for all the South's people."

NEW REPUBLIC
WASHINGTON, D.C.
W. 46,792
SEP 28 1963

Southern Schooling

9649

The South has been struggling to catch up with the rest of the country in education, and slowly and painfully it is making progress – below the college level. But in higher education, particularly in the hot competition for talented graduate students, Southern schools are relatively worse off than they were when the Sixties began.

The Southern Regional Council reports, for example, that among Southern undergraduates who win Woodrow Wilson and National Science fellowships, only about half choose Southern graduate schools. Among Northerners at the same level of promise barely one in 85 goes South for graduate work. Both percentages have declined since 1959.

The South's history of segregation is, of course, a major contributor to this lag. Segregated higher education is expensive. In 1950 Florida spent $360,000 to create a Negro law school which has awarded just 32 degrees in the last eight years. This institution struggles on with 16 students who cost the state $60,000 in salaries alone, even though the integration it was built to forestall long ago came to the University of Florida.

In the meantime Florida finds itself short of the skilled labor needed by the modern industries which have brought so much hope there. Sperry Rand told the United States Civil Rights Commission that its most severe problem in Florida was the shortage of trained workers. "I will take physicists, microwave engineers, and antenna engineers whether they be dark, light or pink," a Sperry executive told the Commission. "I'd be glad to steal them from any company in the area if we can get our hands on them. We have found that the schools that have been teaching electronics are about 10 to 15 years behind modern electronics."

THE CHARLOTTE NEWS
CHARLOTTE, N. C.
D. 62,581

SEP 30 1963

The Disparities

Dr. Vivian W. Henderson, writing under the sponsorship of the Southern Regional Council, has again reminded us that the southern Negro has no monopoly on poverty. His plight is but a reflection of the regional average, shared by an increasing number of southern whites and subject to the old patterns of stagnation and waste exemplified in the backward town and the city slum.

It is no surprise to learn that the South — both white and colored — still is trapped in the widening dollar-gap between region and nation, despite the great strides of the past three decades. Already, Negroes living in the western states have median incomes comparable to that of southern whites. And as more and more talented Negroes leave the South for better opportunities, the less-favored continue their short migrations from rural shack to metropolitan slum. The circle is vicious and sustained.

The southern economist sees the South emerging from the old ways and attempting to find its way back into participation in the national prosperity. It is by no means a fruitless struggle, but it will be a long and grim one. Dr. Henderson speaks of the "traditional race relations" in the South as a major barrier—and he is right. Swifter than many southerners care to believe, the choice will have to be made between custom and continued progress, between lip-service to the idea of progress and a concerted regional effort to make it come true.

★ ★ ★

But at this point in the South's journey—and the facts and figures in the Henderson Report bear this out—the southern problem is not so much a need for radical innovation as it is the need for spreading the social and economic gains already made in the region's most progressive areas.

There is little that the South can do about the race situation that is not already being done or attempted in Charlotte, Nashville, Houston, Atlanta, Norfolk and other progressive communities. The great task lies in making sure that the great metropolitan areas don't become repositories for the failures of the countryside.

There is an ugly law now taking shape throughout the South and few cities can escape it: Rural discontent, economic or racial, is driving the discontented into the cities, swelling the slums and lengthening the relief lines. It does no good for Charlotte or Atlanta to become islands of progress and moderation in the midst of a reactionary and backward countryside if this progress does little more than attract new slum material.

Nowhere is this more evident than in Washington, D.C., where southern Negro migrants saw the dream break apart and the slums open wide. Poverty and backwardness, in this case, are not cured—but transferred.

This could be the fate of the great southern cities unless this disparity is examined more deeply by all southerners. Too often, agitation based on such themes as "all, here and now" is aimed at the point of least resistance. Cities with moderate inclinations are "pinpointed" for further pressures and hoped-for gains. And the ensuing belief that Charlotte or Greensboro or Atlanta hold more promise than a small rural farm swells the urban welfare rolls and places the most progressive communities under an inhibiting human burden.

★ ★ ★

This then is the disparity that often is overlooked by those who want to move the South forward through demands and demonstrations and marches. What, in effect, is being created by this lag between the cities and countryside is a wholly new urban problem, the answers to which remain muddled and difficult.

But answers there must be. The South cannot very well progress one part at a time, disjointedly, without any kind of regional design or coordination: The lessons of Washington loom too large to be ignored, and the region has too far to go to be drawn into the belief that progress can live side by side with backwardness —and not be diluted into failure.

LAFATETTE, LA.
SOUTHWEST LOUISIANA
REGISTER
W. 24,953 (C)
OCT 3 1963

Southmission

Still Much Work to Be Done in South

"Just 25 years ago President Roosevelt released with his own endorsement a report by the National Emergency Council that described a region of the world whose potentialities have been neglected and . . . opportunities unrealized." The report told of inadequate housing, education and health facilities, of an agriculture characterized by absentee ownership, single - crop farming, underemployment and per capita incomes under $200 a year. Too poor to accumulate savings, the people had not developed their own industries and lived in a quasi-colonial economy, exporting staple crops and raw materials and importing most of the manufactured products they consumed.

SOUTH

MISSION

"The report dealt not with a region of Asia or Africa or Latin America but with the 13 Southern states of the U.S. In 1938 the U.S. South was an underdeveloped area within the most developed country in the world, 'the nation's economic problem No. 1.' Now, 25 years later, the South is emerging from that state of underdevelopment. It has attained the diversification of agriculture and industry and the potential for self-sustaining growth that characterize a viable modern economy. Although it still lags behind the rest of the U.S., it has essentially achieved the economic goals toward which such countries as Nigeria, India and Brazil are striving. These past 25 years of its 100-year struggle with poverty illustrate the crucial importance of outside assistance to a people attempting to break through the interrelated barriers that bar the way to development." The long quote is taken from the September 1963 issue of Scientific American from an article entitled "The Development of the U.S. South." The writer goes on to outline briefly how the South has progressed these past years.

THE DIOCESE OF LAFAYETTE is down in the South, way down in what is known as the Deep South. The point of view of the above quote is economic but the same appraisal (in different words) would hold in regards to education. The Sept. 28 issue of the New Republic states quite blandly and with no fear of contradiction: "The South has been struggling to catch up with the rest of the country in education, and slowly and painfully it is making progress —."

And the Southern Regional council reports that among Southern undergraduates who win Woodrow Wilson and National Science fellowships, only about half choose Southern graduate schools. And it is often quoted that Louisiana has more drop-outs than any other state in the union; also, that Louisiana has more illiterates than any other state in the union. It is just simply taken as a matter of fact that the South is behind the rest of the nation in practically all ways, or so it seems.

The point of this article, however, is: There is much work to be done. The facts for this point of view have been given in the current Social Series now running in the Southwest Louisiana Register. Although in a certain town or area the situation may look good, the general view of the Diocese of Lafayette shows that the Church has yet much work to do here.

Support SOUTHMISSION, P.O. Box 532 U.S.L. Lafayette, La.

HOUSTON, TEXAS
INFORMER
W: 11,193 (N)

OCT 5 1963

Editorials

THE PRICE OF YOUR VOTE

"I believe in the right of every American to stand up for his rights and, when necessary, to sit down for them."

--John F. Kennedy

The only thing needed to give more life to the thought and the expressed belief of the President in the above quotation is in the need for every man to fight for his rights, to win his right and to hold his rights, so that he may vote and may influence the history around him through his vote. In other words, we are trying to say that a man without a vote isn't much of a man, and isn't very helpful or effective in this day and time.

We believe that many of our people have been hurt as much by the fact of being deprived of the right to vote here in the Southland, as they have been hurt, in the places where they could vote, by letting themselves be persuaded to ignore the needs of their own race and community to join with certain sections, usually white exploiters. Seldom do they ferret out true friends in the white group and link their efforts with them, rather they let the demagogues fool them and cause them to waste their vote in a lost group that merely wants to mass the Negro vote behind their personal, limited causes.

The Negro in the Southland must win the right to vote, particularly in the Southland such as Texas where Negroes are still deprived by the use of the poll tax from an honest vote. But when they win the vote it will be no good to them unless they make sure to cast it for a candidate and for issues that will advance themselves and all the community that is committed to constructive development.

Too often in instances where the Negro has had his vote in Texas and some of the other southern states, he has made common caus e with demagogues and exploiters which caused the Negro to lose the effectiveness of his vote. It matters not how small the group will be to begin with, it will grow and be effective, if the Negro leadership will apply it to the principles of right and to the practices of picking out the things that mean progress to their group and to other groups with whom they can ally themselves and their votes for the benefit of the general community.

It is sometimes discouraging to note our so-called leaders "ally themselves and join themselves" to the demagogues that are out there just to exploit them and their votes. It is now, and will always be, the obligation and the real task of Negroes to pick their cause on the basis of truth and on the basis of the best interests of all the people; this is better than it will be to try to insinuate themselves in the ranks of the demagogues.

VOTER EDUCATION

The Southern Regional Council began its campaign somewhere about the early part of 1962 to carry out a program to study the causes of voter registration of the people in the South, coupled with some effective method for increasing the southern electorate. We don't know what became of it, but we think it is the beginning of the right thing and of the right step. As we remember it, the chief aim was "to study the most effective method of bringing more southerners into voting participation." It is possible that a great number of these fights to protect the sit-in people and others who, have been forced in the last year or so to fight for other civil rights, and may have temporarily had to put down. But this is the main thing that we are going to have to grow by, and we might as well be studying and planning now how to put into effect the most effective method of bringing more of our people to the polls.

DADDY OF THEM ALL

The North Carolina Mutual Life Insurance Company of Durham, North Carolina, is the largest Negro Insurance Company in the world. It has over $76 million in assets, and more than $300 million in force as insurance. It is also the oldest insurance company.

The second largest Negro insurance company is no slouch, the Atlanta Life Insurance Company of Georgia, a stock company, which is the next biggest in size and strength. It is true to say that all of the Negro companies together put back something like $43 million in benefits paid to clients, and about $49 million in salaries. It is just good now and then to take a look at the bright side of our experiences, and that's all we are doing here.

The Evening Star
WASHINGTON, D. C.
D. 258,167 S. 313,112

OCT 5 1963

Youths in Rights Fight Found 'Pushing' Adults

By CLARENCE HUNTER
Star Staff Writer

Students and young people in the civil rights movement consider themselves prodders of the Nation's conscience, a Howard University faculty member said yesterday.

Dr. Jacob R. Fishman, co-director of the Howard Center for Youth and Community Studies, said the young actionists believe they have to "push the adults" and "take the risks of starting things" to give the desegregation movement its momentum.

Participation in the struggle to free America of its racial ills has had a "very positive effect" on the youngsters because they feel they are doing something for themselves, Dr. Fishman said. By studying their reasons for involvement in civil rights activities, scientists can perhaps learn more about youth who channel their energies into anti-social behavior, he said.

Tomorrow, Dr. Fishman and 33 other social and behavioral scientists conclude their research conference on "Youth and Social Action."

The conference, sponsored by the university's center for Youth and Community Studies, has been under way on the Howard campus since Thursday.

Youth Manifestations

The scientists have been discussing the youth movement as it pertains to freedom rides, sit-in demonstrations and other direct action techniques employed in the civil rights movement. They met with six Howard students who are experienced civil rights demonstrators and workers.

Commenting on the conflict between young and adult leaders of the civil rights movement, Dr. Fredric Solomon of the Department of Neurology and psychology said youths "look to themselves for models and guidance."

"Ask them who their heroes are and they will say, after an awkward silence, our heroes are ourselves," remarked Dr. Solomon.

Own Momentum

The youngsters participate in the civil rights movement because "they feel something is morally wrong" and their activities "exhibit a natural yearning to make their actions coincide with their beliefs," Dr. Solomon pointed out.

"They furnish their own momentum and are right for the times," added Dr. Robert Coles of the Southern Regional Council of Atlanta.

Dr. Arthur Waskow of the Institute of Policy Studies in Washington said young civil rights leaders will have to continue to develop new techniques of nonviolent action if their desegregation activities are to be met with a minimum of violence.

NATION
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W 25,103
PAGE ONE
CERTIFIED
OCT 5 1963
1962

THE NATION

October 5, 1963 . . 35c

Unexamined Contradiction

American Plants Abroad

Frank Kowalski

'SNICK'

Southern Regional Council

THE BATTLE-SCARRED YOUNGSTERS

Howard Zinn

PTA: Irrelevant Giant

William C. Kvaraceus

The Aesthetics of Failure (Paris)

Max Kozloff

LETTERS

Model review

Syracuse, N.Y.

Dear Sirs: Hayden Carruth's review (in the June 15 issue) of Evan S. Connell, Jr.'s Notes from a Bottle Found on the Beach at Carmel seems to me a truly model review of a book that any reviewer must find next to impossible to say right things about. He says what I take to be all the right things; but even did I disagree with him, I think I could only admire the full commitment and thick information which comes through.

Philip Booth

Who's the demon?

Winter Park, Fla.

Dear Sirs: David Cort's assignment of the role of the arch-demon to Arthur A. Houghton, Jr. in a conspiracy to defraud the Cooper Union Museum for the benefit of the Metropolitan Museum (The Nation, Sept. 7, 1963) is one of the most absurd canards I have read in a long time. As the former president of the Cooper Union over a period of twenty-two years, I am only too well aware of the problem of supporting the Museum vis-à-vis meeting the overriding demands of the flourishing undergraduate programs, the library and the adult forums. The charter of the Cooper Union, of which your writer seems to be quite ill informed, provided only for tuition-free instruction in technology and in art, a reading room and an associate group that might carry on a lecture program. The Museum for the Arts of Decoration, organized by the granddaughters of Peter Cooper some forty years after the Cooper Union opened its doors, is outside of the basic framework of this charter. . . .

There were many times during my long administration when the problem of what to do about the museum arose. We tried for years to stimulate interest in the community for its support, but to no avail. . . .

The implication that "Edwin S. Burdell was shuffled off to a technical university in Ankara" is a shabby inference. I anticipated my retirement by several years in order to accept the thrilling challenge of the Turkish Government, the UN and the U.S. State Department to help the Turks establish a regional center of learning in the Middle East modeled after American technological universities. . . .

Skipping over other errors, innuendoes and name calling, to the close of your article, a glaring erroneous statement is made that the Cooper Union is given certain funds annually by the City of New York and hence liable to be held to account in court. Like all other private colleges, it enjoys tax exemption. Beyond that, it has never received a dollar from the city, state or federal government.

Finally, it seems to me unfortunate that an internal matter of institutional policy has been handled in your journal, not in terms of accurate and objective news reporting, but in the style of the yellow journalism of the turn of the century. I would expect something better from The Nation.

Edwin S. Burdell
Dean, Rollins College

Warren, Conn.

Dear Sirs: My hands are bruised and numb from the loud applause I have given to David Cort's article in the Sept. 7 issue. But that is something that I always do when I read an article by him because he is one of the people who have not been changed by racket and conformity and still can think.

Arthur Upham Pope
The Survey of Persian Art

Voice of The Nation

Washington, D.C.

Dear Sirs: I have appreciated your magazine this past year and generally found myself agreeing with your articles. Nevertheless, I am tired of your pose of being alone against injustice and stupidity. It may be good for the ego to believe that you are the only St. George . . . but it is unrealistic.

Typical of this attitude was the opening sentence of your August 24 editorial, "Where Democracy Ends": "The United States, as every reader of the press is assured almost every day, is an almost perfect democracy. . . ." Both the press in this city and in my home town (in up-state New York, which is hardly a hotbed of liberals) have been busy pointing up the faults of this country. Every magazine, even the more conservative, has contained articles on how our democracy is not perfect. . . . Your reading of the press must be restricted to the far Right—but then, they don't believe in democracy anyway, so they wouldn't be advocating it. . . .

Please discontinue this stance of Lone Crusader.

Dorothy E. Wynne

New York City

Dear Sirs: You defended the teacher's right to strike in your editorial ("Society's Scapegoat") in the Sept. 21 issue.

As a teacher—thank you very much. Your magazine has been the lone voice to defend a basic right for the most basic of professions. Robert Little

THE NATION

Saturday, October 5, 1963
Volume 197, No. 10

In this issue

EDITORIALS

189

ARTICLES

191 Irish Winds of Change
Carey McWilliams

193 SNICK: The Battle-Scarred Youngsters
Howard Zinn

197 American Plants Abroad
Frank Kowalski

200 P.T.A.: The Irrelevant Giant
William C. Kvaraceus

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

202 The Aesthetics of Failure
Max Kozloff

203 Complicity with Spengler
Martin Peretz

204 Current Titles of Interest to Nation Readers

205 Letter from Saigon

207 Music: European Report II
Benjamin Boretz

Crossword Puzzle (opp. 208)
Frank W. Lewis

George G. Kirstein, Publisher
Carey McWilliams, Editor
Victor H. Bernstein, Managing Editor
Robert Hatch, Books and the Arts
Marion Hess, Assistant to the Editors
Harold Clurman, Theatre
Max Kozloff, Art
Benjamin Boretz, Music
Carl Dreher, Science
A. R. Ammons, Poetry
Jane Stolle, United Nations
Alexander Werth, Europe
Mary Simon, Advertising Manager

The Nation, Oct. 5, 1963, Vol. 197, No. 10

The Nation published weekly (except in July and August, when biweekly) by The Nation Company and copyright 1963 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York N.Y., 10014. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. Tel.: CH 2-8400.

Subscription Price Domestic — One year $10, Two years $18. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest and the Public Affairs Information Service.

Back copies

New York City

Dear Sirs: I should be glad to give the following copies of The Nation to anyone who would care to have them. I will pay the postage if they are to go outside the country: Almost all the copies from 1960 through 1963 (to date). Lucille Cohen
210 East 26 St.

The Battle-Scarred Youngsters . . . Howard Zinn

Having just spent a little time in Greenwood, Miss., I felt a certain air of unreality about the March on Washington. The grandiose speeches, the array of movie stars, the big names dropped and bounced several times, the sheer impress of numbers—all added up, technically, to an occasion that one describes as "thrilling." And it must have been so to participants and to the millions who watched on television. Still, while swept up in the spirit myself, I wondered if, to the Negro citizen of Greenwood, Itta Bena and Ruleville; of Albany, Americus and Dawson; of Selma, Gadsden and Birmingham; of Danville and other places, it may not have seemed the most Gargantuan and best organized of irrelevancies.

There was one relevant moment in the day's events at Washington: that was when the youngest speaker on the platform, John Lewis, chairman of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee, lashed out in anger, not only at the Dixiecrats, but at the Kennedy Administration, which had been successful up to that moment in directing the indignation of 200,000 people at everyone but itself.

The depth of Lewis' feeling and the direction of his attack may have baffled Northern liberals, mollified recently by the Administration's new Civil Rights Bill, by its bold words and by the President's endorsement of the great March. But John Lewis knew, because the young SNCC workers in his organization are on the front lines of the conflict, that while the President and the Attorney General speak loud in Washington, their voices are scarcely whispers in the towns and the hamlets of the Black Belt.

Greenwood, Miss., just before the March, revealed in its own quiet way how the Deep South remains essentially untouched by resonant speeches in the national capital.

Surrounded by cotton plantations, Greenwood overlooks the Delta from a vantage point in west-central Mississippi. It is the headquarters for the Voter Registration Project, in which all the major civil-rights organizations cooperate, and whose working force is supplied mainly by the youngsters of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC — affectionately called SNICK). It is the seat of Leflore County, where Negroes are 65 per cent of the population and half the Negro families have an income less than $27 a week. Almost no Negroes vote, and attempts of the past year to register Negroes have been met with torch, shotgun and a dozen varieties of official brutality, intimidation and subterfuge.

The SNICK "office" in Greenwood is like a front company headquarters during wartime. As I came in one evening last August, having driven from Memphis, I was greeted by Annelle Ponder, whose younger sister I taught at Spelman College in Atlanta, and whose path has crossed mine several times in the last few hectic years. The Ponder girls are all tall, black-skinned and beautiful. Annelle has been in Greenwood this past year handling the Southern Christian Leadership Conference's part of the voter registration project. She is quiet and courageous. She has been beaten by police in Winona, Miss. When friends went to the jail one day, they found her sitting there, her face swollen and marked, barely able to speak. She looked up at them, and just managed to whisper one word: "Freedom."

With Annelle at headquarters were a bunch of the SNICK kids. One of them came forward to shake hands and we recognized each other — it was Stokely Carmichael, a tall, slender philosophy student at Howard University, born in the West Indies and reared in the sit-in movement. We had met in Albany, Ga., during the first outburst of trouble there in December, 1961.

What was on for the evening? A mass meeting at one of the Negro churches. And then a party at the home of one of the girls.

They showed my wife and me around the building: on the first floor, a big jumbled room for meetings, with a long table in the center — this was the dining room, too, for whatever voter registration workers were around when mealtime came — and a small kitchen to the side, where Mrs. Johnson cooked the meals. Upstairs were cubicles serving as offices, and a large area with two iron cots in a corner, for travelers in the movement. Cartons of books were on the floor; they had been donated by a Northern college, and were soon to go on new pine bookshelves.

At the church meeting, middle-aged Negroes who had lived forty

---

Howard Zinn has been, for the past seven years, chairman of the history department at Spelman College, a Negro college in Atlanta. His Albany (Ga.): A Study in National Responsibility was published by the Southern Regional Council.

and fifty years in the Delta without shaking a white person's hand came up to shake hands and say hello. Greenwood has this past year been going through that tense, hopeful process begun recently in many communities of the Deep South — the first contact on an equal basis with white people; an awakening to the possibility of genuine brotherhood. These first white friends have been college students from New England, or ministers from the Middle West, or just interested people passing through — rather than local whites. But it is a start. And among the SNICK youngsters manning battle posts in the Black Belt have been young white Southerners: Bob Zellner from Alabama, Sandra Hayden from Texas. It is a beginning, and credit belongs mostly to the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee for blasting open in various parts of the Deep South the first pockets of equal interracial contact.

For Southern whites, watching at the edge of these pockets, it is a painful but inexorable educational process. The first reactions to the sight of Negroes and whites in friendly contact are outrage, fury, often violence. But repetition of the vision dulls the reflex and there begins, not acceptance yet, but at least hesitancy.

Perhaps Greenwood police this past year have begun to move into the second stage. When a police car stopped my wife and me as we were driving away from the SNICK party, they seemed at least a little accustomed to the idea. They flashed their lights again and again into our faces and into the car, and cast looks at the house where the lights were on and the noise of the party could still be heard. They spent some time examining identification papers and then (unlike a previous similar experience in Atlanta, where my companion was a Negro and we were arrested) muttered for us to move on.

The next afternoon, a race against time began among the SNICK workers in the Greenwood office. Thirteen youngsters were in Parchman state prison farm, and had been there for two months. Forty-five other Negroes — men and women of all ages — had been on the county prison farm, also for two months. All of them had been arrested in June on charges of "breach of the peace." After much legal delay, release was at hand. A young lawyer, representing the National Council of Churches, had come to Greenwood with bond money for these fifty-eight people. But it turned out that information supplied him by local officials, and transcribed on the bonds, was full of errors, and the county attorney would not accept the bonds. If the transaction could not be completed by that Friday afternoon, the prisoners would have to spend another weekend in jail.

The proper information was quickly compiled, and all available typewriters and people who could type were assembled in the Voter Registration Project office. The new data were typed in. The papers were taken to the sheriff. Just before dusk on Friday the fifty-eight emerged.

The headquarters that night had the eerie quality of a field hospital after a battle. Youngsters out of jail — sixteen and seventeen years old — were sprawled here and there. Two of them lay on the narrow cots upstairs while a few of the SNICK girls dabbed their eyes with boric acid solutions; some dietary deficiency in jail had affected their eyes. One boy nursed an infected hand. Another boy's foot was swollen; he had started to lose feeling in it while in "the hot box" at Parchman, and had stamped on it desperately again and again to restore circulation. Medical attention was refused them in prison. The cold newspaper reports of the past few years about people arrested in various parts of the Deep South for demonstrating have never conveyed the reality of a Black Belt jail.

Three SNICK youngsters, with a tape recorder on the broken-down table near us, told about their arrest, and about life at Parchman. The first was Willie Rogers:

> . . . it was twenty minutes to one when the chief came out of his car and across the street in front of the courthouse. It was June 25th — Tuesday. The chief said, I'm askin' you-all to move on. We said that we were up there to get our folks registered. So he said, I'm askin' you-all to move on, you're crowdin' the sidewalk — the sidewalk was clear. We walked up to the courthouse steps so as not to block the sidewalk. He said, I'm askin' you to leave now. We said we came to get them registered and soon as they registered we would leave. So he started placing us under arrest — one by one. . . .
>
> We stayed in jail about two hours before trial came off, and the judge sentenced us to four months and $200 fine for refusing to move on, and about an hour later they came and took us to the penal farm, which we stayed out on the penal farm about a week and worked. . . . Tuesday, without us knowin', they had sentenced us to Mississippi State Penitentiary, Parchman, Mississippi. . . . Two boys named John Hanley and Arthur Jackson and I — he put us in the hot box. We stayed in the hot box two nights. It's about five foot nine inches square, which they call it the hot box. Long as they don't turn the heat on — with three in there — you can make it. There's no openings for light or air — there was a little crack under the door, but you couldn't see your hand before your face less you get down on your knees. When they got ready to feed you they hand the tray through a little door which they close — and then you can't eat unless you get down on your knees by the light comin' in the door — then you can see how to eat. And they had a little round hole in the floor which was a commode — about as big around as a six-pound bucket top. After we stayed in there those two nights, the sergeant started pickin' at me: "You're the lyingest nigger in Greenwood, aren't you?" I told him no, I didn't lie, which I had, because I didn't tell him nothing about the movement in Greenwood. . . . The last night he decided to take our T-shirts and things — so we decided not to wear no underwear. So he decided to open all the windows and turn on the fans, and the beds that we were sleepin' on, they didn't have no tick or nothing, just metal, and had round holes in it. So last night I didn't sleep — I stayed up all night and all day today and he came in right after lunch and MacArthur Cotton and I, we weren't saying anything, and the guards came around and handcuffed us to the bar. . . . I'm seventeen.
>
> . . . My name is Jesse James Glover. I live in Itta Bena, Mississippi. I was arrested at the courthouse in Greenwood — charged for likewise, not movin' on. Some of the older people with us, they moved on. But we didn't think it expedient to move, because the courthouse is a public place. So we stayed. . . . We had a trial next morning. We didn't have a lawyer. . . . We stayed at the county farm four days. We dug ditches in the white part of town. We decided among ourselves we weren't going to work or eat any more because we were afraid of being shot from a car passing the road or by one of the guards, because we were all working with SNICK. We didn't eat for two days, neither worked, then they came to take us to Parchman. There was about 25-30 policemen outside with guns and blackjacks and things standing around the bus when we came out — we all put our hands behind our heads and they searched us all, put us on the bus. So we left. . . . We stayed there a week and then I took sick. He didn't let me see a doctor. That's the man in charge. They call him "sergeant." We ate twice a day. At night they put the fan on and it was cold. We were sleepin' on a steel bunk with forty-four holes in it. . . . A week later I was put in a place called the hot box. I stayed in this hot box two days and a half. I was put in because Freddie Harris and Lawrence Guyot and I was whisperin' to each other. Another week I was put in the hot box again. I stayed there four days. About half a week later he said some lice had gotten in the place, so he cut all our hair and gave us some blue ointment and put fourteen of us in a cell — two beds for fourteen of us. We stayed there all night. About another week, I got put into this hot box again — he said we were talkin'. He put nine of us in this box — it's about six by six. Nine of us — we couldn't lie down. . . . Three or four more days they began to take our T-shirts and cut our food in half — so we gave our shorts back because we said what good are shorts without T-shirts. So they put us back in the cell, without our shorts, and turned of the fan again. We were naked. It was real cold. . . . The next day he put thirteen of us in the hole, this six by six hole. We were making it okay about 30 minutes with the fan off — breathing in this oxygen, lettin' out this carbon dioxide — and the air was evaporating on top of the building, and it got so hot the water was falling off the top of the building all around the sides like it was raining. One boy was taken sick in the box. They took the sick boy out — they didn't take him to a doctor — they put him in a cell for that morning. He let us out of the hot box that morning, back in the cell. We told everyone to keep quiet because we didn't want to get in the hot box again — it might cause a death in the hot box. So we all was quiet for a long time. Then a few fellows were talking to each other. He came down and told Lawrence Guyot, I'm going to put these niggers up to this damn bar if I hear any of this racket — so they hung MacArthur Cotton, Arthur Jackson, and Willie Rogers on the bars — MacArthur was singin' some Freedom songs. . . . Altogether, I was thirteen days in the hot box. . . . How did I get in the movement? I was at a mass meeting in Itta Bena. I'd been walkin' and canvassin' on my own. Bob Moses asked me, did I want to work with SNICK. I told him yes. So from then on I been working. Monday I'm startin' school, but in the evening in Itta Bena I'm going to get young people to work with me canvassing — teach the old people how to fill out the forms — try to get my town moving.

Manchester Guardian

"Well what do you know, it does say something about Race, Color or Creed."

. . . My name is Fred Harris. He came around and said, you gonna move? you gonna move? And he frightened the old people. And when we didn't move he arrested us. . . . I stayed in the hole four days. In all I spent 160 hours in the hole — the hot box that is. He told me next time he found paper on the floor in my cell he would hang me up by my arms and my legs. And about a week after that I asked to see the doctor, and he told me, yes, when I die. I'm seventeen. I'll be starting school Monday. I got involved with the movement back in 1960, when SNICK came up. I was fourteen then. Sam Block was talking to me about the movement. I told him, yes, I'd be glad to help, and I started from there on. . . . At first my mother didn't want me to be in it. Then she realized it would be best for her and for me If I were in the movement, so she told me I could go ahead and work in the movement. . . .

While the returned prisoners took turns lying on the bunks, SNICK workers were being delivered to different parts of the Negro section of Greenwood to announce a mass meeting that night to welcome the prisoners back home. You find, roughly, three kinds of SNICK workers in a place like Greenwood: two or three regular staff members, who make $10 or $20 a week — in those weeks when there is money; ten to fifteen students from various parts of the country who have left school temporarily to work with SNICK, and who subsist on $5 or $10 perhaps every other week; indeterminate numbers of young people from the town and the surrounding countryside, who volunteer their time, risk their lives and their liberty, and get an occasional meal at headquarters.

I sat in on the staff meeting next morning, held in the large main room. In one corner was a boiler, in another a rubbish can. On the walls were a map of the City of Greenwood, newspaper clippings on civil rights, photos of Pete Seeger when he was in Greenwood, photos of Jim Forman (executive secretary of SNICK). Scattered around were two typewriters, some broken chairs, books and newspapers and a big pot for Kool-aid.

But if poverty showed in the material possessions at SNICK headquarters, the human resources were something else. Chairing the meeting was Bob Moses, the quiet fighter in charge of the Voter Registration Project, a veteran by now of Mississippi violence and nonviolence. Here was Sam Block, silent, thin, dark, his home deep in the Delta, who did the early reconnaissance for SNICK in the area and almost lost his life for it. Here was Willie Peacock, also from Mississippi, another SNICK veteran. Annelle Ponder was here, representing SCLC (Martin Luther King's group); Martha Prescod, a slender college student from the North; Stokely Carmichael, the fiery young man from Howard; Jean Wheeler, a smiling coed, also from Howard. Here too was a former star student of mine at Spelman College — her home a little town in South Carolina — now just graduated from Yale Law School: Marian Wright. With her was another graduate from Yale, a young white fellow named Oscar Chase. (Chase recently wrote a valuable legal paper which shows how the federal government, by bold, imaginative use of the injunction, could fulfill its responsibility to protect the constitutional rights of Negroes in the Deep South.) In the room also was another of the increasing number of white college students in this essentially Negro-led movement — a California sociology major named Mike Miller, who has done impressive research on civil-rights matters. And five of the youngsters just out of Parchman jail were present.

That afternoon we drove in two cars to Itta Bena, a feudal cotton village outside Greenwood, where Negroes came off the land to meet in a dilapidated little church, welcome back the Parchman prisoners, and sing freedom songs with an overpowering spirit. One of the returned prisoners was Mother Perkins, fragile and small, seventy-five years old, who had just spent, like the rest, two months on the county prison farm for wanting to register.

Cars filled with white men rumbled by along the road that passed by the church door, but the meeting and the singing went on. Anyone who felt the urge got up and spoke. An old man rose on his cane and said: "All these years, going along behind my plow, I thought some day things would change. But I never dreamed I'd see it now."

Bob Moses told them that Negroes — and whites — were without jobs in all the big cities of the nation, that they could not run away any more from the Delta to Chicago and Detroit, that they must stay and wrench from the State of Mississippi what they deserved as human beings. Marian Wright told them a fable about an eagle that for a long time was told it was a chicken and believed it. Stokely Carmichael reminded them that while the Lord might be on their side, they would have to secure their rights by their own intense efforts. Meanwhile, the automobiles kept passing on the road outside.

The crushing conclusion that comes out of Greenwood, Miss. — and Selma, Ala., and Danville, Va., and Americus, Ga. — is that the federal government is but a shadow in the hard-rock places of the Deep South. Standing at the foot of the Lincoln Memorial, John Lewis turned his wrath, not at the easy target, the Dixiecrats, but against the Administration. "It is the federal government that indicted nine of our people in Albany." The Democratic Party, Lewis made clear, cannot be treated as a savior as long as it lives with Eastland, nor can the Republicans, harboring Goldwater. "What political leader can stand up and say his party is the party of freedom?" And then, the most dangerous question one can ask in a country boasting of its two-party system: "Where is our party?"

To many, the March had been presented as a gigantic lobby for the Administration's Civil Rights Bill, but Lewis pointed quickly, unerringly, to the weaknesses in the bill. Furthermore, by sponsoring a new civil-rights bill, the Administration had skillfully turned attention to Congress, and deflected the erratic spotlight of the civil-rights movement from possibly focusing on inadequacies of the Executive.

The straight, crass fact at which John Lewis was aiming is this: the national government, without any new legislation, has the power to protect Negro voters and demonstrators from policemen's clubs, hoses and jails — and it has not used that power.

Despite the welcome new words of concern by the Kennedy Administration, despite several dozen suits filed by the Justice Department in voting cases, the Negro in the Deep South still stands alone and unprotected as he tries to eat in a bus terminal, register to vote, or hand out a leaflet on a street corner. The right to vote, and freedom of expression, are not in themselves solutions to the fundamental problem, which is a rearranging of economic and political power in the South. But they are prerequisites to that rearrangement.

There is a constitutional rock to which the Executive branch can tie its lines and then smash, with all the power at its command, every Wallace, every Barnett, every Chief Pritchett, every Commander Lingo, every Bull Connor, who ever begins to lift a billy club at an American citizen exercising his constitutional rights. That is the Supreme Court's statement in the Debs case of 1895: "The entire strength of the nation may be used to enforce in any part of the land the full and free exercise of all national powers and the security of all rights entrusted by the Constitution to its care."

But to act on that dictum calls for certain traits which the Administration has thus far not shown: imaginativeness in the use of the courts; boldness in the exercise of Executive power; the courage to set new precedents in federal relations; the willingness to by-pass Congress on an issue about which Congress spoke its mind in 1866 — when it passed the Fourteenth Amendment.

Above all, it means changing to the offensive. Up to now the Administration has simply reacted to every racial crisis. Southern officials have thrown thousands of people into jail, and then put the burden on the civil-rights movement to get them out. The national government needs to act, and then put the burden on Southern segregationists to revoke the action; let them wrestle with courts, raise money for trial, plead for toleration.

The "equal protection" clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, the Supreme Court's statement in the Debs case, the declaration of Section 242 of the U.S. penal code that any official who deprives a person of his constitutional rights has committed a federal crime: these are the already-existing legal bases for Executive action. That action requires, first, stationing all over the South hundreds of federal agents (replacing the F.B.I., which is incompetent in the field of civil rights) to protect the constitutional rights of Negroes. These agents would have the specific assignment, and the authority granted by the President, to jail any local official who violates the Constitution.

At the same time, the President must begin filling—as he has failed to do so far — the federal judgeships of the Deep South with persons committed to the principle of equality, regardless of the wishes of the region's Senators. Among the outworn political institutions of this nation is that of "Senatorial courtesy," which requires Kennedy to consult Eastland in the appointment of a federal judge in Mississippi, Talmadge and Russell in Georgia. The shattering of precedent can start here. Then, a combination of quick-acting federal agents and determined judges can begin to rivet into the mind of the Deep South, and into the mind of the nation, not that Negroes are equal (that will take time), but that if they are not treated equally the consequences will be swift and harsh.

When ten CORE and SNCC people, white and Negro, walked into Alabama to try to establish what Bill Moore, at the cost of his life, had failed to establish — the right to walk safely on a public highway — a cordon of federal marshals should have surrounded them. And when Alabama Safety Director Al Lingo showed up with his electric prod poles and guns, he should have been taken immediately into federal custody.

The burden of legal proof needs to be borne by the segregationists, and this has not yet been done. Any good lawyer knows that the advantage is in the hands of the man who moves first, that delay and bureaucracy and legal complications all work against those who are trying to undo an action. Yet the civil-rights movement, which cannot help it, and the Justice Department, which can, have been on the defensive.

The needed initiative is not likely to come from a government whose dedication to racial equality is as circumspect as that of the Kennedy brothers. It took a series of explosive crises throughout the nation to force from them words of moral concern that became part of the Constitution a hundred years ago. It took something close to a revolution to bring forth a moderate civil-rights bill, which will be further moderated by Congress, and by segregationist federal judges, and by a cautious Justice Department.

Basic changes are needed in the social structure of the nation before meaningful racial equality can be established. But in the Deep South, a prerequisite for such changes is the establishment of the right to vote, to organize, to speak, write and assemble freely and without fear of violence. That requires a radical new use of initiative and power by the national government. And because the Administration — and inherently, any administration — lacks the internal motivation for such a seizure of initiative, it will have to be prodded by the increased use of nonviolent direct action.

Right now, those who see this most clearly, feel it most intensely, and are best prepared to move on it, are the young people in the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee.

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D.C.
D. 408,701 S. 491,212

OCT 5 1963

Student Role In Protests Is Studied

By Robert E. Baker
Staff Reporter

Student participants in sit-ins and other civil rights demstrations see themselves as prodders of the Nation's conscience, a group of social scientists reported yesterday.

The two dozen social scientists are attending a three-day conference at Howard University dealing with the dynamics of the youth movement for desegregation. They talked to reporters at a press conference yesterday.

According to Jacob R. Fishman, student demonstrators feel that the Kennedy Administration has moved too slowly in the civil rights field and that progress would have been even less without their activities.

The students also see the proposed civil rights legislation before Congress as "empty and a farce," said Fishman, co-director of Howard University's Center for Youth and Community Studies.

If the civil rights movement bogs down or fails, said Arthur Waskow of the Institute of Policy Studies, the students will probably invent new techniques for attacking the old system.

One such technique may turn out to be the 25,000-member civil rights "army" proposed by the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, Waskow said.

Dr. Fredric Solomon of Howard's Department of Psychiatry said that student activity in social and political fields has increased greatly over the past five years on campuses throughout America.

In many cases, he said, this has been caused by the yearning of students to coincide their actions with their beliefs.

Fishman told reporters that the study by experts of student involvement in pro-social actions such as civil rights demonstrations may provide information on the causes of anti-social and deliquency.

The intellectual impact of desegregation and the student movement was stressed by Kenneth Kenniston of Yale University's Department of Psychiatry.

He said the impact is widespread on campuses throughout the Nation and may transcend the desegregation issue in importance.

During a discussion of white attitudes in the South, Dr. Robert Coles, psychiatrist with the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta, said that white Southerners generally have two contradictory sets of beliefs.

On one hand, he said, they favor segregation but, on the other hand, oppose mob action and favor continued public education.

The problem in the South, Dr. Coles said, is one of leadership which too often has taken advantage of one set of beliefs—the preference for segregation. Such leadership, he said, thus destroys the other set of beliefs.

White Southerners are much more flexible than some of their leaders picture them to be, Dr. Coles said.

DOTHAN, ALA.
EAGLE
D 24,469 S. 25,419

OCT 7 1963

Negro Vote Growing

With a rash of court actions and the continued drive of Negroes for registration of voters, the poll lists are swelling to quite considerable proportions throughout 11 Southern States, according to some recent figures.

Wiley Branton, executive director of the voter education project of the Southern Regional Council, reported that 115,000 Negroes were registered in the first year of a sustained campaign. This was done, he said, "despite apathy on the part of many Southern Negroes, intimidation from segregationists and lack of full cooperation from the federal government."

There are many who will take issue with that statement, particularly about the lack of government cooperation. If the continuing pressures of Bobby Kennedy and his cohorts are not cooperation they'll have to get a new name for the efforts.

Branton said that hundreds of field workers pressed the campaign and that besides the 115,000 registered an additional 25,000 who would have been purged from registration lists retained their voting rights through the project's efforts and other "uncounted thousands" of Negroes registered for the first time without the workers' aid.

However, he estimated that of five million eligible Negroes, only 1.5 million were registered in the States of Louisiana, Mississippi, Florida, South and North Carolina, Texas, Arkansas, Tennessee, Alabama and Virginia.

On the other hand, there was some later information in a news story the past few days which stated that the number of Negro voters in Alabama had been nearly doubled.

All of this leads to an inescapable conclusion and it is that it behooves white people, not only in the South, but everywhere, to register and then go to the polls and vote. With the Negro birth rate reportedly increasing rapidly it is not beyond the realm of reality that in years to come diligently organized Negroes could outvote an apathetic white electorate.

The Virginian-Pilot
NORFOLK, VA.
D. 119,187

OCT 8 1963

Council Sets 1st Meeting

NORFOLK — Dr. James McBride Dabbs, president of the Southern Regional Council of Human Relations, will speak Oct. 21 at the first public meeting of the Norfolk Council of Human Relations.

The meeting will be held in the home of Mrs. H. M. Silverman, 419 Hariton Court, at 8 p.m. Mrs. Silverman and Mrs. C. P. Wisoff are cochairmen of the council's Board of Directors.

The council, Mrs. Silverman said, has as its objectives the improvement of economic, civic and racial conditions in Norfolk through racial cooperation. It is an affiliate of the Virginia Council of Human Relations.

Dr. Dabbs, who will speak on "The South in Transition," is the author of "Our Southern Heritage."

INSIDER'S NEWSLETTER
NEW YORK, N.
W. - CIRC. NOT AVAIL.
PAGE ONE
CERTIFIED
OCT 8 1962

THE NEW RECONSTRUCTION ROAD

Carpetbaggers--'62 style--are moving in on the South again, in the wake of Mississippi's crisis. The modern administrators, cast as professional desegregation consultants, are quietly visiting communities ordered to lift the color curtain. So far, these sages have been chiefly of local origin--a superintendent of schools who has guided his own district to peaceful integration offering advice and counsel to nearby towns--but as integration picks up speed, full-time professional advisors are answering the demand.

In response to scattered calls for help, The Potomac Institute has just surveyed Southern school administrators to find out what aid was needed, or would be accepted. Of those questioned, 88 per cent agreed a central bank of information should be set up; 56 per cent wanted on-the-spot consultants who had dealt directly with holding together a newly-integrated school system; 59 per cent hoped for regional desegregation conferences (said one superintendent, "It's later than we think"). Result of the survey: The U.S. Office of Education is now organizing a desegregation service under Dr. Herbert Conrad--will build a file of information, consultants, and district officers for school boards willing to accept the inevitable and seek aid. Already serving the schools: the Southern Regional Council of Atlanta, whose Dr. J. J. Brewbaker (ex-superintendent of schools in Norfolk, Va.) has helped many towns avoid the road to riot.

Biggest problem facing consultants: a citizenry riled by advice from outsiders. The Potomac Institute found superintendents who opined the consultant would have to be sneaked into town, or that school boards wouldn't accept "invading troublemakers." (School boards, in turn, said they wanted help but the superintendents wouldn't allow it.) Other administrators thought they couldn't ask for help, even literature, until a court ordered it--fearing parents protesting voluntary capitulation. Although the Office of Education is dragging its feet in setting up the integration service--wary of ordering in the "feds"--reconstruction is underway. Optimists predict the South may

COPYRIGHT © 1962 BY COWLES MAGAZINES AND BROADCASTING, INC. ALL RIGHTS RESERVED.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
WORLD
TW. 9,700
PAGE ONE (N)
CERTIFIED
OCT 9 1963

Civil Rights Conference Slated At Tuskegee Soon

The first of a series of seminar-conferences to analyze, interpret and report to the nation on the compelling implications of the Civil Rights progress and related developments in the elimination of disadvantage for all Americans will be held at Tuskegee Institute October 25-27.

The major areas of focus will be education, economics, and civic participation, with particular concern for the immediate needs of Negroes in the transition to a fully desegregated public life in America.

Results of the conference will be reported to the general public with a special focus on the opportunities which confront leadership at all levels in American society.

About 500 persons in the field of education, the mass media, community leadership and government are expected to attend the general sessions. Sixty especially selected leaders in education, business-labor, and civic affairs have been invited to participate in the workshops sessions.

Among those heading the list of Lawson, District Juvenile Court participants are Georgia State Senator Leroy Johnson, James M. Dabbs, president of the Southern Regional Council, Mrs. Marjorie Judge, Dr. Donald J. Bogue, University of Chicago, Irene B. Taeuber, Princeton University, Ted Posten, New York Post, Dr. Roger D. Heyns, vice president of the University of Michigan, Earl B. Dickerson, president of the Supreme Life Insurance Company, Arthur Chapin, U. S. Labor Department; Dr. Herman Long president-elect of Talladega College, James H. Dumpson Commissioner of Welfare of New York City, Dr. Eli Ginzberg, Columbia University, Frederick H. Jackson, Carnegie Corp; and members of the Tuskegee Institute faculty.

A preliminary report on the conference states: "Tuskegee Institute has an historical commitment to help the advancement of full Democracy in America, and it has always had a particular concern for disadvantaged people." "In addition to its teachings and research responsibilities, Tuskegee has always sought to mobilize leadership to promote constructive public action."

Subsequent conferences have been tentatively scheduled for the Spring and Fall of 1964.

TROY, ALA.
MESSENGER
D. 3,111 S. 3,111

OCT 9 1963

Negro Vote Growing

With a rash of court actions and the continued drive of Negroes for registration of voters, the poll lists are swelling to quite considerable proportions throughout 11 Southern States, according to some recent figures.

Wiley Branton, executive director of the voter education project of the Southern Regional Council, reported that 115,000 Negroes were registered in the first year of a sustained campaign. This was done, he said, "despite apathy on the part of many Southern Negroes, intimidation from segregationists and lack of full cooperation from the federal government."

There are many who will take issue with that statement, particularly about the lack of government cooperation. If the continuing pressures of Bobby Kennedy and his cohorts are not cooperation they'll have to get a new name for the efforts.

Branton said that hundreds of field workers pressed the campaign and that besides the 115,000 registered an additional 25,000 who would have been purged from registration lists retained their voting rights through the project's efforts and other "uncounted thousands" of Negroes registered for the first time without the workers' aid.

However, he estimated that of five million eligible Negroes, only 1.5 million were registered in the States of Louisiana, Mississippi, Florida, South and North Carolina, Texas, Arkansas, Tennessee, Alabama and Virginia.

On the other hand, there was some later information in a news story the past few days which stated that the number of Negro voters in Alabama had been nearly doubled.

All of this leads to an inescapable conclusion and it is that it behooves white people, not only in the South, but everywhere, to register and then go to the polls and vote. With the Negro birth rate reportedly increasing rapidly it is not beyond the realm of reality that in years to come diligently organized Negroes could outvote an apathetic white electorate.

THE NASHVILLE TENNESSEAN
D. 129,288 S. 208,237
PAGE ONE CERTIFIED
OCT 10 1963

Board Decision Due Today on Life Lines

By EUGENE DIETZ
Education News Editor

The Metro Transitional Board of Education, amid growing protests over admission of the controversial Life Lines materials to schools, will decide this afternoon whether to approve the leaflets for school use.

"I've never had any idea of admitting Life Lines to classrooms," Supt. W. H. Oliver of the city system said yesterday.

● See editorial, "Bar Life Lines In the Schools," page 20.

But, he said, the city-county school staff recommendation as to whether the conservative literature should be placed in libraries will not be reached until sometime today when he will confer with Supt. J. E. Moss of the county.

THE TWO superintendents, along with their staffs, will prepare a recommendation for consideration of the school board during a 4 p.m. session today in the county system's offices on Bransford Avenue.

The board asked for the staff recommendation after a request from Neely Coble, local trucking agency executive, for permission

(Turn to Page 3, Column 3)

FORT WORTH, TEXAS MIND
W. - 12,407 (N)
PAGE ONE CERTIFIED
OCT 10 1963

Negroes In Need Of More And Better Jobs

ATLANTA (ANP) — The need of Negroes particularly of Negro southerners, for more and better jobs is underscored by economist Vivian W. Henderson in a short study," The Economic Status of the Negro: In the Nation and In the South," published last week by the Southern Regional Council.

Henderson is professor and chairman of the department of economics and business administration at Fisk University. He is currently serving as a visiting professor at North Carolina State College in Raleigh.

Despite gains made since World War II, Dr. Henderson finds "little cause for optimism regarding rapid change in the status of Negroes in the near future."

While the income of Negro families and individuals nationally has grown over five times since 1940, it is still "little more than one-half" that of American white families and individuals.

Moreover, Dr. Henderson points out, "in the South Negro families have an income of less than one-half (46%) that of white families and only one-half the income" of non-southern Negroes.

The proportion of Negro families with incomes between $4,000 and $6,000 tripled between 1941 and 1961, and the number of Negro families with incomes of more than $6,000 grew from 4 per cent to 9 per cent during the same period.

But the Henderson study shows that these gains occurred between 1940 and 1954. Since that time, the income gap between Negroes and whites has widened.

Board Decision

(Continued From Page One)

to put the four-page tabloid into schools here. Coble said he thought it would help teach patriotism.

The tabloid, published three times a week, is one of the major propaganda operations backed by H. L. Hunt, Dallas billionaire who has supported numerous extreme rightists, including the late Sen. Joseph McCarthy.

Coble could not be reached yesterday for further comment. He had said Sept. 29 he did not intend to engage in any "headline controversy" and would have no more to say about his request.

SCHOOL officials told Coble last month that carefully planned programs are in operation here now which teach patriotism.

Numerous Nashvillians said yesterday they fear that admission of Life Lines literature to the public schools here would open the door to similar requests from a wide array of religious, racial, political and economic agencies.

The Rev. Frank P. Grisham, chairman of the Civic Committee for Public Education, said last night:

"I'm opposed to bringing these materials into schools. Just sitting on the doorsteps are worlds of people wanting to distribute materials to students—materials more objectionable than this."

THE LIFE Lines publications call those who disagree with Life Lines views the "Mistaken."

Mrs. Harold Bradley, immediate past president of the Nashville branch of the American Association of University Women, in a reference to this sort of thinking of Life Lines, said:

"We have always believed that true Americanism is promoted by a free discussion of all public issues. Life Lines assumes that true Americanism precludes discussion of issues, and that one must accept a particular point of view.

"Life Lines, therefore, is defeating the very heart of true Americanism — that people can differ in their points of view and still be good citizens."

MRS. MOLLY TODD, active in numerous social and civic movements, said:

"If they are going to have material representing one side of the political spectrum, I see no reason why the "New South" (racial publication published by the Southern Regional Council) and various other publications, including one by the United Church Women, should not be admitted, too."

She said she intends to ask the board to approve several publications, including New South, if the Life Lines request is granted.

Mrs. Arville Wheeler, president of the Nashville chapter of the American Association for the United Nations, said it is "difficult for me to understand why any group" should protest the work of the U.N. as the agency's "sole purpose" is to seek peace.

E. C. CARMAN, vice chairman of the school board, said Sept. 28 that " other special interest groups" will ask school officials to use their materials if the Life Lines request is approved.

"The schools belong to all the people," said Carman.

Dr. Avery Leiserson, chairman of the political science department at Vanderbilt University, appeared before the board Sept. 27 to ask the group to reject the application to make Life Lines materials art of the classroom programs.

The Atlanta Journal
"COVERS DIXIE LIKE THE DEW"
D. 259,003

OCT 10 1963

Boycott Ruined Store, Albany Grocer Testifies

Anderson Conspiracy Trial Enters 2nd Day

ALBANY, Oct. 10 (UPI)—The government put on more witnesses Thursday in its attempt to prove that civil rights leader Dr. W. G. Anderson conspired to obstruct justice by leading a crippling boycott against a white grocer who served on a jury in a civil rights case.

An all-white, all-male jury is hearing the case in the federal court of Judge J. Robert Elliott.

Anderson, former head of the integrationist Albany Movement, and two others were indicted on charges that they had conspired against Carl Smith, who depended heavily on Negro trade for the success of his thriving grocery business.

Smith voted against Negro Charles Ware in a civil rights suit last April. Ware had sued Sheriff L. Warren Johnson for $125,000 on a contention his civil rights were violated because the sheriff shot him after he was placed under arrest.

The jury in that case found for Johnson and a poll of the jurors showed how Smith stood.

Smith testified Wednesday that what followed included picketing and harassment of customers until his grocery business, which had netted between $30,000 and $35,000 last year on a gross of $295,000, dwindled away to nothing shortly after his jury duty.

He said he was forced to sell the business for $27,000 after first closing his doors.

Other witnesses were Harold Gulliver, a reporter for The Atlanta Constitution; Vernon Jordan Jr., a Negro employed by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People as a field secretary until last May 30 and now employed by the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta; and Police Chief Laurie Pritchett.

Smith testified that the Ware-Johnson suit wound up on April 12 and his troubles began on April 20 when a group of Negro boys and girls paraded in front of his store carrying signs reading: "Justice is dead here" and "Black hands can ring cash registers too."

The grocer said police ran the youngsters off but they returned and officers finally arrested them.

Smith denied, under cross examination by defense attorney D. L. Hollowell of Atlanta, that he ever saw any police dogs in the area of his store or that he had urged police to turn dogs loose on the pickets.

He said that after the picketing incident that Luther Woodall Jr. and Robert William Colbert, both indicted along with Anderson, physically blocked the entrance to his store.

Smith, frequently mopping his brow, testified for more than two hours. He said he had employed two whites and from 14 to 22 Negroes in his store. On cross examination, he said that only four Negroes were employed on a regular basis.

He said he paid parttime school boys $12 a week for afternoon work; a Negro produce boy $35; one Negro butcher $45 a week and another $50, and a white meat market manager $87.

Both Gulliver and Jordan testified about attending a mass meeting of Negroes at the Shiloh Baptist Church at which Anderson spoke.

Gulliver said he heard Anderson say that "any Negro who keeps Carl Smith in business is as guilty as members of the jury" (in the Ware case).

Jordan said he heard Anderson say, "Carl Smith is as guilty as Sheriff Johnson" and quoted Anderson further as saying "if you go in Carl Smith's store you are as guilty as Sheriff Johnson."

On cross examination, Jordan added that he never heard Anderson mention the word "boycott" and that he did not hear Anderson tell anyone not to shop at Smith's store.

THE ATLANTA CONSTITUTION
For 95 Years the South's Standard Newspaper
D. 202,635
PAGE ONE CERTIFIED
OCT 10 1963

Ruined By Pickets, Grocer Says

By BILL SHIPP
Constitution State News Editor

ALBANY—An unemployed white grocer testified in federal court here Wednesday that "my business went to nothing" when Negroes picketed and blocked the entrance to his grocery store less than two weeks after he served on a federal jury in a civil rights case.

Carl Smith, the former owner of a supermarket in the heart of the Albany Negro district, testified that the pickets and a total boycott forced him to sell his store for $27,000 of which he got only $8,500 in cash. He said the store had been grossing a total of $295,000 a year.

Smith gave testimony as a prosecution witness against Dr. W. G. Anderson, president of the integrationist Albany Movement, on trial on charges of obstructing justice and conspiring to obstruct justice.

Others who testified as the United States opened its case against Dr. Anderson were Vernon E. Jordan Jr. of Atlanta, former state field secretary for the NAACP and now an employe of the Southern Regional Council; Harold Gulliver, reporter for The Atlanta Constitution, and Albany Police Chief Laurie Pritchett.

Grocer Smith, speaking in a low voice and frequently mopping his forehead, testified that pickets showed up at his store at about 1:30 p.m. last April 20.

"I went out and bought them all a drink. They thanked me and they were very polite about it," Smith said. He said the pickets left but later returned carrying signs which read:

"Justice is dead here, justice has never lived here, let black hands ring black money."

The prosecution, led by District Atty. Floyd Buford of Macon, entered a number of signs into evidence.

Continued on Page 13, Column 1

Pickets Ruined Him, Grocer Says

Continued From Page 1

Smith testified that Luther Woodall Jr., who is facing trial on the same charges, and Robert William Colbert, led the demonstrations at his store. Colbert has pleaded guilty to the charge in a New York federal district court and has received a suspended sentence.

SAYS ENTRANCE BLOCKED

Smith said Woodall and Colbert physically blocked the entrance into his store and when some Negro customers got by them "They would come in and get them by the hand and lead them out."

He testified that on a normal Tuesday he would do from $275 to $400 in business. On the day of the picketing Smith said he took in between $6 and $7. And on the following day, when he decided to go out of business, he testified that he sold "nothing except maybe a package of cigarets."

Smith said Woodall and Colbert told Negroes outside the store that "I wanted Sheriff Johnson to kill that Negro, and I hated all Negroes."

(Smith served on a jury in a civil rights case, Charlie Ware, a Negro, vs. Baker County Sheriff L. Warren Johnson. The jury found in favor of Sheriff Johnson on April 12, 1963.)

TALKS ABOUT PAYROLL

Smith said he had never been approached about hiring a white cashier in his store, which had a total payroll of 14 Negroes—most of whom were part time — and two white persons.

Smith said he had been on friendly terms with Dr. Anderson and that the year before the picketing started he had heard a rumor that the Albany Movement wanted him to hire a white cashier.

"Dr. Anderson told me everything was all right and I took him at his word," Smith said.

Defense attorney Donald Hollowell of Atlanta questioned Smith about his employment practices and asked him if he had ever seen Dr. Anderson conferring with anyone about the boycott and picketing at his store. Smith said he had not.

Smith told the court that he had realized an annual net profit of from $30,000 to $35,000 from his supermarket before the Negroes forced him to close. Hollowell asked Smith how it was possible for pickets led by two teen-agers to force him out of business after only three days of demonstrations.

"I was already out of business. I just had to close my doors," he testified. He said on one occasion a Negro purchased some turnips from him and that one of the pickets took the turnips away from her, gave her 25 cents and told her to go some place else to buy turnips.

"If I touched one of these boys I'd have been out of business anyway. So I just closed up," he said.

Reporter Gulliver was the prosecution's first witness. Gulliver testified that he attended a mass meeting of the Albany Movement at Shiloh Baptist Church on April 15. Referring to notes he said he made at the meeting, Gulliver testified that Dr. Anderson delivered an address in which he said:

"Sheriff Johnson has been let loose again . . .

"Members of that jury were as guilty as was Sheriff Johnson . . . and every Negro who trades with Carl Smith is just as guilty."

Gulliver said he also heard Dr. Anderson say he was certain Carl Smith favored the innocent verdict for Johnson because "the jury was polled and there was no doubt."

CROSS-EXAMINED

Gulliver, on cross-examination, said he knew that boycotts were being carried out at the time against other Albany merchants.

Vernon Jordan, who said he was to be the principal speaker at the April 15 meeting, testified he heard Dr. Anderson tell the audience:

"If you go into Carl Smith's store you're as guilty as Sheriff Johnson."

Jordan said that he knew boycotts were being carried out in the Albany area to "register indignation" at segregation practices.

Police Chief Laurie Pritchett, questioned by Asst. District Atty. Wilbur Owens of Albany, testified that he phoned Dr. Anderson after learning of his remarks at the April 15 mass meeting.

Pritchett said Dr. Anderson told him that "the jury had given Warren Johnson the right to shoot any Negro . . . he said action would be taken against Carl Smith, but he said he didn't know whether it would be direct action, picketing or word of mouth," Pritchett said.

However, on cross-examination, Pritchett testified that he had heard Dr. Anderson direct no one to picket or boycott Carl Smith.

The trial opened with Federal District Judge J. Robert Elliott examining the prospective jurors in mass from lists of questions submitted by both the prosecution and defense. Attorney Hollowell took exception to the fact that the judge had failed to ask all questions submitted by the defense.

The jury is composed of 12 white men and two alternates — one a white woman and the other a white man.

ALBANY, GA.
HERALD
D: 27,154 S: 26,791
PAGE ONE CERTIFIED
OCT 10 1963

IN FEDERAL COURT

Anderson Denies 'Control' In Negro Boycott of Store

By JIMMY ROBINSON
Herald Executive Editor

Dr. W. G. Anderson, ex-president of the Albany Movement, told two Federal Bureau of Investigation agents in a May 3 interview that he regretted grocer Carl Smith had been "put out of business," but that a boycott and picketing of his store were "spontaneous" among local Negroes and he had no control over these demonstrations.

This statement was made from the witness stand in U.S. District Court here this morning as the Federal Government continued its case against Anderson, indicted for conspiracy to obstruct justice in connection with economic reprisals against Smith who served on a Federal jury in a civil rights case and voted against a Negro plaintiff.

The testimony came from Marion Cheek, FBI agent stationed here, who said he interviewed Anderson in the presence of a fellow agent, William Bolyard.

He Was Advised

Anderson was fully advised of his legal rights, Cheek testified, and when the interview ended, declined to sign a statement covering the points under discussion in it.

Anderson told the agents he had known Carl Smith a long time, and that Anderson's father had been Smith's friend for many years, Cheek declared. The Negro osteopath, now in surgical residency in a Detroit hospital, said the Albany Movement's position on Smith's store was that a year previous to the events of April, 1963, a boycott had occurred of Smith's store by its largely Negro clientele because of Smith's failure to employ a Negro cashier. Anderson said his father talked to Smith about this issue, Cheek declared, and that later Anderson himself made a purchase at Smith's store to indicate that the boycott was not in effect at that particular time.

Questioned concerning Smith's jury service, Anderson said he was not aware that Smith had been a

Turn to Page 5A, Col 4

Anderson Denies

(Continued From Page 1)

Federal juror until some time later. Anderson, according to Cheek, said he had a discussion with C. B. King, local Negro attorney, concerning the matter between April 12-15, and Anderson said King told him he should not call for any action against Smith because of his jury service. Anderson said he had this legal advice before he addressed a mass meeting of the Albany Movement April 15.

"General Nature"

Anderson said that at the April 15 mass meeting his remarks were of a general nature, according to Cheek, and that while he did not mention Smith by name, he did refer to the "juror in the expensive suit and the Florsheim shoes."

Anderson denied giving Luther Woodall Jr. and Robert William Colbert, indicted with him by a Macon grand jury as conspirators in the Smith case, any instructions to picket or boycott Smith's store, Cheek related.

The osteopath said he regretted Smith had been put out of business, according to Cheek, but added that the boycott and picketing were "spontaneous" and that he had no control over them.

Under cross-examination, Cheek said he had never heard Anderson tell anyone to picket or give verbal directions to picket, but he added that Anderson said he was technically responsible, as head of the Movement, for its actions.

Word of Mouth

He also said, under cross-examination, that the boycott of the Smith store started April 16 "by word of mouth" and that this fact was substantiated by a decline in business.

Other Government witnesses this morning included B. C. Gardner Jr., attorney for Smith and for Baker County Sheriff Warren Johnson, who was involved in the civil rights suit of last April; Jim Fritz, who said he was co-owner with his father-in-law Smith of the Highland Avenue grocery; William Hannah of Albany, local correspondent of the Atlanta Constitution, and Phil Farkas of Albany, marketing director of a local candy company who identified himself as Hannah's assistant on some news stories.

Gardner testified that Colbert and Woodall "grabbed" prospective customers at the Smith store and told them "don't buy segregation" and "don't spend your money here, this man served on the jury last week that freed Sheriff Johnson." He said he told Woodall the information he was giving prospective customers was not true. Gardner said he had told Woodall that Smith had not made a statement that NAACP field secretary Vernon Jordan Jr.

Smith testified flatly that Negroes picketing his business dropped his gross annual revenue from $295,000 to virtually nothing and that he was compelled to sell his store for $27,000, although his business netted him a profit of between $30,000 and $35,000 in the preceding year.

Listing himself as "not employed" at present, he told of his U. S. jury service last April in which, as one of a panel of 12, he voted in favor of a defendant, Baker County Sheriff L. Warren Johnson, in a civil suit brought against him by Charlie Ware, Baker County Negro.

"Black Hands" Posters

Picketing of his Highland Avenue store began April 20, Smith said, when Negro boys and girls began parading carrying signs with such slogans as "Justice Is Dead Here" and "Black Hands Can Ring Cash Registers Too." Smith said he bought the pickets a drink, but that after Luther Woodall Jr., who was indicted by a Macon grand jury with Anderson on conspiracy charges, spoke to the group, they put down the drinks. These pickets left voluntarily when asked to do so by police, but later returned and police arrested them, Smith testified.

The ex-grocer said Woodall and Robert William Colbert, also indicted with Anderson and Woodall, blocked the door of his store, told customers that he was the one who served on the Federal jury, and that both came into the store at different times. He said Woodall took one of his customers outside the store and the latter never returned, and that a woman customer left the store when she was spoken to.

On April 24, Smith testified, he closed the store for good and sold his business later. He said he had employed two whites and 14 to 22 Negroes, not including himself and his son-in-law, Jim Fritz, and had employed the same racial ratio for years.

Under questioning by Judge Elliott, Smith testifeid that Woodall and Colbert not only prevented customers from entering the store but, if they came in, took them by the hand and "pulled them out." He said normal receipts for a Tuesday at the grocery were $300 to $400, but on the last Tuesday of operations they were down to $6 to $7.

Smith was questioned more than an hour under a sifting cross-examination by Hollowell. He said he had four "regular" Negro employes, two schoolboys who worked in the afternoons and an "extra group" for Saturday work. Two cash registers, he said, were handled by himself, his son-in-law and prospective customers at the Smith store and told them "don't buy segregation" and "don't spend your money here, this man served on the jury last week that freed Sheriff Johnson." He said he told Woodall the information he was giving prospective customers was not true. Gardner said he had told Woodall that Smith had not made a statement that approved of Sheriff Johnson killing a Negro or any Negro. He estimated the value of Smith's business at a minimum of $150,000 and a maximum of $250,000. (Smith testified yesterday he sold it for $27,000).

Under cross-examination, Gardner said he had not seen Anderson on the occasion of any visits to Smith's store.

Fritz testified largely in the same vein as testimony given by Smith yesterday. He said Woodall and Colbert stopped customers from entering the store and told them Smith had said Sheriff Johnson should have killed the Negro plaintiff (Charlie Ware) and that he wished all Negroes were dead. Fritz said one customer, Ernie Lee Johnson of Leesburg, was "literally dragged" from the store by Woodall whom he said was joined by Colbert. He related a steep decline in business receipts from picketing and boycotting and of the eventual sale of the business.

Cross-Exam

Under cross-examination, Fritz said he had never seen Anderson picket or tell anyone not to go into the store, nor did he see pickets talk to Anderson.

Hannah testified he covered an April 29 Albany Movement meeting at Mt. Zion Baptist Church where Anderson spoke. He said he heard him say Smith was not being boycotted because of his service as a Federal juror but because he had asked the year before that Smith hire a Negro cashier. He said Smith had a right to his opinion whether or not he was a Federal juror. Anderson said he still thought Johnson was guilty "even if Kennedy himself turned him loose."

Farkas, who said he covered the same meeting, gave almost the same testimony. Questioned by defense counsel D. L. Hollowell, Farkas, said Anderson never mentioned anything about Smith being picketed because he was a Federal juror, and did not hear Anderson tell anyone to boycott Smith.

Wednesday afternoon, the Government put three more witnesses on the stand, including grocer Carl Smith, Albany Police Chief Laurie Pritchett and former but on the last Tuesday of operations they were down to $6 to $7.

Smith was questioned more than an hour under a sifting cross-examination by Hollowell. He said he had four "regular" Negro employes, two schoolboys who worked in the afternoons and an "extra group" for Saturday work. Two cash registers, he said, were handled by himself, his son-in-law and a white woman cashier. Hollowell queried the witness closely on the matter of salaries, apparently attempting to show a disparity between those paid white and Negro employes.

Denies Dogs Seen

Smith denied he had ever told Albany police to use police dogs on the picketers and said he had not seen any police dogs in the vicinity of his store. He told of Woodall taking a bunch of turnip greens away from a worker in the store who was attempting to serve a customer.

Asked by Hollowell if two teenaged boys had been permitted to shut his business in three days, Smith replied "That's right" and added: "If I had touched one of those boys, I'd have been out of business."

Smith replied, when questioned, that he had filed an income tax return on his $35,000 net profit.

He insisted that no one had ever asked him about changing his policy on employing only a white cashier, and said a year before the incidents his employes had heard a rumor and told him he would be boycotted unless he hired a Negro cashier. Later he testified that J. D. Anderson, father of the defendant, had "addressed the matter" of the cashier policy to him, and that Dr. Anderson "told me everything was all right."

Couldn't Do Business

Woodall and Colbert, Smith testified, made the statement that he "hated Negroes." He said he sold his store because "I couldn't do any business with those two boys there" and that he had no other reason to sell.

Under redirect examination by Asst. U. S. Atty. W. D. Owens Jr., Smith said that on last April 20 he had 16 employes—two whites and 14 Negroes.

Jordan, who said he was employed as an NAACP field secretary until last May 30, then took employment with the Southern Regional Council, said he had been asked to address a mass meeting of the Albany Movement last April 15 in Shiloh Baptist Church. At this session, he said, Anderson made the statement that "Carl Smith is as guilty as Sheriff Johnson" and "if you go in Carl Smith's store you are as guilty as Sheriff Johnson." Under cross - examination, Jordan testified that Anderson did not mention the word boycott and that he did not hear him say not to shop at the Smith store.

Pritchett Testimony

Chief Pritchett said he telephoned Anderson last April 16 to ask about a rumor of "action" to be taken by the Albany Movement following the mass meeting. Anderson told him, Pritchett testified, that when the jury "turned loose" Johnson, they gave him the right to shoot a Negro, but that this would be "harder than it used to be."

Pritchett said he asked Anderson specifically about possible "action" on Carl Smith, and that Anderson's reply was he was "sure" there would be some, but could not say what form it would take.

Under cross-examination, Pritchett said Anderson did not say he would ask anyone to picket or boycott Smith and that Anderson had not been among those arrested for picketing the Smith store.

Judge Elliott explained to the jury, at defense request, that Woodall was not on trial in this case. The jurist said Woodall is a juvenile and that special Federal procedures are provided for handling such cases. These include a chamber hearing without a jury.

Colbert, also not on trial here, has pleaded guilty to the same charge facing Anderson and received a suspended sentence from a Federal court in New York.

MEMPHIS, TENN.
WORLD
TW. 7,400 (N)

OCT 12 1963

Civil Rights Conference Slated At Tuskegee Soon

ATLANTA, Ga.—(SNS)—The first of a series of seminar-conferences to analyze, interpret and report to the nation on the compelling implications of the Civil Rights progress and related developments in the elimination of disadvantage for all Americans will be held at Tuskegee Institute October 25-27.

The major areas of focus will be education, economics, and civic participation, with particular concern for the immediate needs of Negroes in the transition to a fully desegregated public life in America.

Results of the conference will be reported to the general public with a special focus on the opportunities which confront leadership at all levels in American society.

About 500 persons in the field of education, the mass media, community leadership and government are expected to attend the general sessions. Sixty especially selected leaders in education, business-labor, and civic affairs have been invited to participate in the workshops sessions.

Among those heading the list of Lawson, District Juvenile Court participants are Georgia State Senator Leroy Johnson, James M. Dabbs, president of the Southern Regional Council, Mrs. Marjorie Judge, Dr. Donald J. Bogue, University of Chicago, Irene B. Taeuber, Princeton University, Ted Poston, New York Post, Dr. Roger D. Heyns, vice president of the University of Michigan, Earl B. Dickerson, president of the Supreme Life Insurance Company, Arthur Chapin, U. S. Labor Department; Dr. Herman Long president-elect of Talladega College, James H. Dumpson Commissioner of Welfare of New York City, Dr. Eli Ginzberg, Columbia University, Frederick H. Jackson, Carnegie Corp; and members of the Tuskegee Institute faculty.

A preliminary report on the conference states: "Tuskegee Institute has an historical commitment to help the advancement of full Democracy in America, and it has always had a particular concern for disadvantaged people." "In addition to its teachings and research responsibilities, Tuskegee has always sought to mobilize leadership to promote constructive public action."

Subsequent conferences have been tentatively scheduled for the Spring and Fall of 1964.

ATLANTA, GA.
WORLD (N)
D. 29,800

OCT 12 1963

Dr. Pitts, Noted Educator, To Be Men's Day Speaker At Ebenezer Baptist Sunday

DR. LUCIUS H. PITTS

Indications are mounting that the Men's Day Program at the Ebenezer Baptist tomorrow morning, when Dr. Lucius H. Pitts, President of Miles College, Birmingham, Alabama, will be featured speaker, will have a large attendance, it was announced by Dr. M. L. King, Sr. Pastor. Dr. Pitts, formerly Executive Secretary of the Georgia Teachers and Education Association will be introduced by Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.

Dr. Pitts is widely known as an educator and currently serves on numerous boards and committees, including the Advisory Committee of the Federal Civil Rights Commission, the Board of Directors of the Southern Regional Council and the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U. S. A.

Deacon Joseph Marshall will preside at the service, which begins at 10:45 A. M., and the organ prelude will be rendered by David C Stills, Jr., organist. Responsive reading will be led by Deacon Jethro English, and prayer will be offered by Deacon C. B. Evans.

Music throughout the service will be rendered by the Men's Chorus, led by David C. Stills, Director.

During the evening service, Deacon Henry Wallace will preside with prayer offered by Deacon Milton C. Cornelius. The Responsive reading will be led by Rev. McWilliams.

Deacon James Kemp will present a "Gospel Song Feast" featuring Mrs. Mary Gurley and Mr. Eugene Harris.

Church news announcements for the Men's Day program are as follows:

SUNDAY MEETINGS:

9:30 A. M. — Sunday School.

4:00 P. M — Crusader's Extension Class — Mr. and Mrs. Enoch Harris 642 Highland Ave., N. E. No. 11.

4:00 P. M. — Mission Circle 2— Mrs. Flossie Hollis — 63 Ashby St. S W.

4:00 P. M. — Mission Circle 3 — Lounge. Christian Ed. Bldg.

4:00 P M — May Club — Dea and Mrs. Ozzie Alexander — 967 Beckwith St. SW.

4:00 P. M. July Club —— Mrs. Janie Lewis — 286 Alaska Ave., NE.

4:00 P. M. — August Club —Mrs. Rachel Ward — 188 Jackson St. NE.

4:00 P. M. — November Club —— Mrs. Eva B. Williams — 80 Morris Brown Dr. SW.

4:30 P. M. Mission Circle 4—— Room 103.

5:00 P. M. — All Men's Day Captains are urged to make your Final Reports to The Finance Committee — Room 200.

Hall — Adult N. W. Crawford Union Harvest Program — Fellowship Hall — Adult N. W. Srawford Union No. 2 in charge — Dea. Jethro English, President. All young people are requested to meet in the Christian Ed. Bldg., with Mesdames Reed, Ingram, Rodgers and Elder.

Immediately following Morning Worship — All Young People born in October are urged to meet Mrs. Sallie Brookins and Shirley Anderson, by the Piano.

Members of Ebenezer and friends in the Atlanta Communty are invited to attend the Atlanta Missionary Baptist Associaion, Rev. M. L. King, Sr., Moderator — which opens on Monday night — Oct. 14 with the Young People's Program— Beulah Baptist Church, Edgewood — Rev. E. D. Thomas, Pastor. This Session will continue through Thursday, Oct. 17

The New York Times
D. 680,265 S. 1,306,418

OCT 13 1963

NEGRO VOTE GAINS IMPORTANCE FOR '64

Both Parties Step Up Efforts to Garner Bloc Vote In the Realization It Could Swing Election

By TOM WICKER

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Oct. 12 — When President Kennedy at his news conference this week advised Italian-Americans "as Columbus Day comes up" not to be ashamed of the singing mobster, Joseph M. Valachi, he was indulging the oldest established custon of American politics — paying court to a powerful minority group.

The term is tricky. "Minority groups" do not merely include ethnic blocs like Italian and Polish Americans, religious denominations like Jews and Mormons, or racial divisions like Oriental. Almost everyone, in one way or another, belongs to a minority group.

Definition Varies

In New York City, for instance, it is statistically likely that what some minority-minded politicians call "wasps"—white Anglo-Saxon Protestants—are the real minority group. In some states, and in the country as a whole, farmers fit the category. In some cities, persons owning houses valued at more than $35,000 are in a definite minority. Catholics form a minority group in Tulsa, but not in Boston. And if Mr. Kennedy's new Postmaster General, John Gronouski, can be fairly called a member of the Polish-American minority, it is equally true that he also is a representative of Doctors of Philosophy — a minority group if there ever was one.

Thus, the term "minority group" must be handled with care, even when one is talking about the most indentifiable, perhaps the largest of them all —the Negroes. For in some areas of major Northern cities, in many smaller Southern communities, the Negro is not in a minority at all. Nashville, Tenn., for instance, rapidly is becoming a Negro city ringed by white suburbs.

On a national basis, however, Negroes are a definite minority group. Negro voters are even more so. Figures broken down by race are hard to establish, but the Census Bureau estimates the population of voting-age Negroes at about 10,000,000. In 1960, about 3,500,000 of them registered to vote in states outside the Old Confederacy. Within it, another 1,500,000 registered—a total of 50 per cent of potential. All told, that year, about 60,000,000 Americans of all hues and creeds cast a ballot.

Sought-After Group

In the national election, Negroes are perhaps the most sought after minority group of all. Five million Negro voters are worth having in one's corner on any basis. The distribution of Negro voters and their bloc voting make them triply valuable.

This is because in many major cities in major states—New York City in New York State is the prime example—Negroes, if they vote more or less as a bloc and in something like their numbers, often hold the balance of power as between all the other minority groups that make up the electorate. At least theoretically, as Southern politicians never tire of pointing out, Negroes in Harlem can swing the city, the state and the country for one Presidential candidate or another.

The Negro voting power is not always so sweeping, but it was, for instance, a major factor in the defeat of Eugene (Bull) Connor in Birmingham. In many another city — Winston-Salem, N.C., is an example —Negro support can make or break a mayoralty candidate.

'White Revolt'

Thus, as 1964 approaches, amid growing talk of a "white revolt" against President Kennedy's integration policies, the Negro vote assumes ever-greater importance among politicians of both parties. If it goes massively for Mr. Kennedy, it could be a most important factor in re-electing him. If it fails to turn out its potential, it could defeat him. If it deserts him, he might as well run for mayor of Palm Beach.

The outlook, at first glance, seems bright that it will support him massively. No potential Republican candidate can present a better or more publicized record on civil rights. Most Negro voters are of low economic status and, like such voters everywhere, in all races, turn naturally to the enduring New Deal image of the Democrats. Dr. George Gallup's ubiquitous snoopers reported in September that among Negroes sampled, 95 per cent would support Mr. Kennedy against Senator Barry Goldwater, and that Governor Rockefeller would fare little better.

Fear and Apathy

The picture is not really that good. Forty per cent of Negroes in the crucial Northern cities are believed to be unregistered and are known to be hard to register. Poverty-ridden Negroes, like the economically down-trodden of all races generally, care little for voting and have to be dragooned into registering. They are unaware of the importance of the ballot. Many fear entanglement with "the law" (in New York City, registering to vote can lay a man open to low-paid jury duty, for instance), and most have little educational background.

Some entrenched Negro political leaders, like their white counterparts, resist registration drives. Expanding the electorate they believe, could endanger their control of their small empires. This holds down new registration, particularly in Chicago and New York.

In the south, where Mr. Kennedy will badly need every vote he can get, most Negroes live outside the cities. In many black belt counties, they are barred from voting by racist whites. Even where no such barriers exist, poor and uneducated Southern farmland Negroes usually have been too apathetic or afraid to cast a ballot.

Volatile Voters

There is even a hard-core of Negro Republicans. In Atlanta in 1960, Negroes voted heavily for Richard M. Nixon and swung the city. Some of these are like other Americans — they get ahead economically and turn Republican. Others, mindful of American history, stick with the party of Lincoln. No one knows how many Negroes think Mr. Kennedy is moving too slowly in civil rights, but as has been shown in Cambridge, Md., angry Negroes can vote in protest against what appears to be their interest.

Moreover, the Negro vote is highly volatile. If, between 1932 and 1936, the New Deal could swing the mass of Negro voters out of their historic Republicanism and into the party that invented white supremacy, it is at least conceivable that hesitation, inaptitude or some glaring fumble on Mr. Kennedy's part could swing them right back again next year.

In 1964

By and large, however, the President's civil rights and economic policies are believed by both parties to have won the lion's share of the Negro vote for 1964. Former President Eisenhower and Senator Goldwater have virtually conceded that point. And one of the most important of Democratic tactics for 1964 is to register and vote as many Negroes as possible.

This week in Brooklyn, a Democratic team working with the Democratic National Committee, began a well-organized drive to register 10,000 Negroes and Puerto Ricans—out of nearly a half-million unregistered in New York City. It sounds like a massive project, but it was not, for about 125,000 voting age Negroes and Puerto Ricans live in the designated areas.

It was a fairly typical effort. In Indianapolis, a registration drive recently netted over 15,000 Negroes. Negro candidates for local office have just helped Akron and Toledo, Ohio, Democrats to pick up about 5,000 new Negro registrants in each city. A big push in Charlotte, N. C., helped Democrats in that Southern state to gain about 15,000 new Negro voters this year. In Memphis, Tenn., there now are 80,000 Negroes registered to vote—many of them recent additions to the rolls. All told, Democratic officials here estimate they have registered perhaps 200,000 Negroes this year for the first time—virtually all as Democrats.

Propaganda

So far, the campaign has consisted mostly of propaganda by the Democratic national committee, Negro organizations, local leaders, the Congress for Racial Equality, the Southern Regional Council, even the African Methodist Episcopal Church —all urging Negroes to register in the party of their choice.

That is usually the Democratic party. But results this year, measured against potential obviously are modest. Next year, Democratic officials say, will be different. The emphasis will shift from propaganda to solid, doorbell-ringing work, in every promising precinct that can be reached, North and South. In the heady political atmosphere of a Presidential campaign that might be fought largely on the civil rights issue, they expect nothing less than a "great upsurge" of new Negro voters—Democrats, naturally.

Hesse in The St. Louis Globe-Democrat
"Now—getting back to the Negro vote."

Conrad in The Denver Post
"Your position on civil rights is killing us in the North and the South."

Long in The Minneapolis Tribune
"Right of way!"

Little in The Nashville Tennessean

MACON, GA.
TELEGRAPH
D. 47,067

PAGE ONE CHECKED

OCT 14 1963

GEORGIA PIPELINE

Negroes Lagging In Registering

By GENE BRITTON
Telegraph-News Bureau
1504 Watson Blvd., Warner Robins

ATLANTA — Aside from the "techniques of discrimination" practiced by white registrars as described in the recent report of the United States Civil Rights Commission, organizers of Negro voter registration drives are running into some real impediments.

According to what appear to be the most reliable estimates by experts, the net increase in number of Negroes on the voting roles in Georgia since 1958 has been only about 25,000. In 1958, Georgia had 161,958 registered Negro voters. The current estimate of the Southern Regional Council is 185,899.

This increase appears somewhat minimal in view of the concentrated efforts of the SRC's Voter Education Project and other well organized movements, especially in the South, to bolster Negro political strength.

Even in areas where there is no attempt on the part of white voter registration officials to hold down the number of registered Negro voters, the gain in Negro voter registration generally is less than impressive.

Registration drive organizers say one of the biggest impediments to their work is the difficulty in convincing Negroes themselves that the ballot is a proper and effective lever for securing acknowledgement of their rights to full, first-class citizenship.

Jack Minnis, research director for the Voter Registration Project, contends that "it's a lot easier to get people to take part in demonstrations than to register to vote."

Voting is something of an abstract, he points out, whereas participation in a civil rights demonstration is, or may be, a direct confrontation with a policeman or a police dog or a fire hose.

In one instance, the Negro has the opportunity to feel that he is personally, physically involved in the struggle for his rights and that what he is doing is leading to something direct and concrete. In the other instance, in the case of marking a ballot and putting it in a box or throwing the levers on a voting machine, there is less of a sensation of effectiveness.

Too, Mennis points out, Negroes are sometimes unable to see that it's worth while to register to vote— particularly in cases where their registration may involve harrassment from the registration officials, court battles and/or various forms of intimidation— when, having gone through all it sometimes takes for a Negro to register, they find themselves in the voting booth facing a choice between one white supremist candidate and another white supremist candidate.

Regardless, many vote drive organizers say that more and more Negroes are coming to regard the ballot as an effective—or potentially effective—weapon in the freedom movement. And sometimes the registration drives are given new life by unexpected stimulants. Frequently, attempts to intimidate prospective Negro voters will backfire.

Mennis said there appears to be a direct correlation between acts of violence perpetrated against Negroes and the willingness of Negroes to register.

Recently, he said, in a Middle Georgia county near Macon, a young Negro man was arrested on a minor charge one Saturday night, and, in the course of his confinement in jail, was beaten by the police. Word of what had happened spread swiftly throughout the local Negro community. It was a community which had seen no great movement of Negroes to get on the voter registration rolls. But within one week after the beating, 600 Negroes in that county became new registered voters.

Mennis, who is active in only one of several current voter registration drives, says his group is not "completely satisfied with the results of our work," but he adds, "we are not altogether unhappy either." Voter Education Project claims to have added about 115,000 Negroes to voter rolls in 11 Southern states in the year and a half it has been active. It's still working.

The Virginian-Pilot
NORFOLK, VA.
D. 119,187

OCT 18 1963

Relations Group to Hear Author

NORFOLK — Dr. James McBride Dabbs, president of the Southern Regional Council on Human Relations, will speak to the first monthly meeting of the Norfolk Human Relations Council Oct. 21 at 8 p.m. at 600 Talbot Hall Road.

Dr. Dabbs, author of "Our Southern Heritage," will speak on "The South in Transition." The meeting is open to the public.

The Norfolk Human Relations Council is concerned with the improvement of economic, civic, and racial conditions in Norfolk through racial cooperation, a spokesman said.

Cochairmen of the board of directors are Mrs. C. P. Wisoff and Mrs. H. M. Silverman. People who wish to join the group should contact Mrs. E. A. Green of 1215 Cloncurry Road.

The Norfolk council is one of 23 in Virginia, all affiliated with the Virginia Council on Human Relations.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
ALABAMA MIRROR
W. 14,436 (N)
PAGE ONE
OCT 19 1963

Tuskegee Calls Confab On Disadvantaged Americans

Tuskegee Institute, Ala.—Nearly 500 leaders in education, government, industry, labor and community affairs to participate in a major conference sponsored by Tuskegee Inst., it was announced here today by Dr. L. H. Foster, president of the 82 year old institution. To be held here on October 25 and 26, the group will analyze the problems and "report to the nation" on the elimination of disadvantage for all Americans in the areas of edcation, economic development and civic participation.

The Conference will be featured by a convocation at which honorary degrees will be awarded. It is to be held in conjunction with the annual meeting of the Institute's Board of Trustees composed of 25 distinguished Americans, headed by Basil O'Connor as Chairman.

Two general meetings and a number of workshop seminars have been organized for the Conference sessions.. These will open with an address by Mr. O'Connor outlining Tuskegee Institute policies to place its full resources in advancing a public life for all Americans, unhampered by discrimination and disadvantage based on race.

Dr. Eli Ginzberg, professor of economic at the Graduate School of business, Columbia University, will read an opening paper on "America and the Negro", describing the current American scene and the position of the disadvantaged Negro.

Included among the participants in the Conference are: Dr. Joseph Douglass of the U. S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare; Dr. Roger D. Heyns, vice president of the University of Michigan; James Dumpson, New York City commissioner of welfare; Arthur Chapin of the U. S. Department of Labor; Dr. Hylan Lewis of the Health and Welfare Council of National Capital Area, Washington, D. C.; Dr. Carl Marburger. director, Greater Cities Project, Detroit, Mich.; James Dabbs, president of the Southern Regional Council; Dr. Vivian Henderson, visiting professor at North Carolina College; and Dr. Donald Bogue, professor, University of Chicago.

(Continued on Page 6)

Tuskegee Calls Confab On Disadvantaged Americans

(Continued From Page 1)

Also, Maxwell Hahn, executive vice president, the Field Foundation; Ted Poston of the New York Post; P. F. Ayer, Berea College, Kentucky; Frederick W. Jackson, executive associate, Carnegie Corporation of New York; Senator Leroy Johnson; Judge Marjorie Lawson, District Juvenile Court, Washington, D. C.; and Samuel Z. Westerfield, deputy assistant secretary for economic affairs, Department of State. Others will be Dr. Whitney Young, executive director of the National Urban League, and Dr. Harold Fleming of the Potomac Institute of Washington, D.C.

The Rev. Ralph Sockman, minister of the Church of Christ in New York City, will deliver the sermon at Chapel service, Sunday, October, 27.

A summary of the Conference is to be issued at its conclusion and a full report published early in 1964. Two follow-up conferences are planned for later dates in the academic year.

SATURDAY REVIEW
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 298,174

OCT 19 1963

RACIAL IDENTITY IN SCHOOL CHILDREN

Children in the South, both Negro and white, are confronting the normally difficult tasks of education under conditions of unusual social stress. Caught up in an historic moment of social change, they, their parents and their teachers must live and work in a volatile world of tension, hostility and incipient violence. In an effort to learn how these children see themselves and respond to each other, what color means to them, and how they handle the strains of desegregation, Robert Coles, a child psychiatrist, spent two years in the deep South establishing close acquaintanceship with the first Negro children to attend white schools in Atlanta and New Orleans, and with a number of their white classmates. In New Orleans the children were first, second and third graders; in Atlanta they were adolescents in the last two years of high school. Dr. Coles is consultant to the Southern Regional Council, which sponsored the research on which this article is based. The project was carried out with financial support from the New World Foundation and the General Education Board. Dr. Coles is also Research Psychiatrist at the Harvard University Health Services.

By ROBERT COLES

"YOU are a doctor, so you must be clean," the lad told me firmly. Another time he was less emphatic and more curious: "How can you cure niggers if you have to be good and treat whites, too?" At the age of six this neat, rather sturdy boy who wanted to be a doctor knew his racial distinctions as well as his letters and numbers at school. He is exceptionally bright, and after two years we had come to know one another well, through our talks, but also through our games and drawings. Children of his age are not the best conversationalists, but they have much to tell, and in play or with crayons they can be very informative.

His picture (below) with its Negro encircled and obviously excluded helps tell what desegregation means to him; the Negro has arrived at his school, but must be kept cordoned off from whites. It is a child's image of what apartheid means. From his earliest moments of speech his parents had started telling him about the importance of racial differences and separation. They were militant segregationists, and would talk freely about their attitudes—I had always agreed with them that their views must be fairly known in any research study of what happens in desegregation. They had taken their son Jim from the first grade of his school in New Orleans when one Negro girl had been assigned there under federal court order. The events surrounding that crisis in school desegregation in the South are easily recalled because of their very disturbing nature: riots, vandalism, a total boycott of one school by whites and another boycott kept partial only by the presence of a handful of five to ten white children. Jim had missed a half year of schooling because of the boycott, but the next year white parents became increasingly aware that the choices for their children were no schooling, private schooling at considerable cost, or attendance at tokenly desegregated public schools. In the face of such alternatives, the boycott died. "I decided that Frantz School was as much mine as that nigger's, and besides, Jimmie wanted to go back real bad," his mother recalled.

"The Negro has arrived at his school, but must be cordoned off from whites."

After two years Jimmie and his family began to grow accustomed to my visits. Our relationship had become a relaxed and trusting one. They were poor, but proud and ambitious people, anxious for their only son to be educated. Jimmie has his father's Irish quality of light hair and flushed complexon, but the dark brown eyes of his mother's French stock. His father, with two other children and a sick mother, struggles hard on the meagre income of a utility company repairman. They own a small white frame house in the industrial west of the city. They have no air conditioning to help resist the sieges of clammy heat which can persist for weeks in the city's subtropical climate—bills and bad weather set nerves on edge as powerfully as old memories and dreams. Whites and Negroes live close by in this older section of the once mighty river port. Indeed Jimmie lives a scant four or five blocks from the little girl whose entrance to his school so enraged his parents, and, I think, confused their son.

Jimmie and I one day were walking to a nearby playground for a game of "catch" when he asked me whether I thought his school would be "flooded with them." He had just been telling me that he really didn't mind the colored girl in his class because he generally stayed clear of her. He had played in a game with her one time, but there had been others involved in this misdemeanor too, and "besides, it's when a lot of them come that we'll get dirty with them all around." This well-scrubbed boy knew how annoyed his mother was when he came home with his clothes torn or caked with mud. He pursued the disasters threatened by integration in other talks. Once, as we played with a doctor's kit I had brought for him he said, "They do bad, and make us get sick." He had heard his mother talk about various diseases as typical of Negroes, and knew enough to predict his susceptibility to contamination or disease at their hands.

He represented his little Negro classmate, Ruby, in his drawings not merely encircled as if in jail, but in caricature—with exaggerated teeth and ears and a general appearance resembling a vampire. Asked to imagine her grown, without hesitation he drew her holding a primitive but recognizable vacuum cleaner. When I pointed out to him the obvious irony of unclean people keeping the homes of others tidy, he smiled knowingly and told me that they had jobs to do. With that the paradox in his eyes appeared to vanish. I know white children in Atlanta ten years his senior who confront the same paradox with a similar reply. One girl daily eats food prepared by a Negro, lives in a house kept almost uncomfortably spotless by her, yet she has lectured me insistently upon their "poor morality" and lack of "clean standards." She resolves her doubts with thoughts like the following: "It's different when they come out here, because they are influenced by our way of living. But when they go back to their own homes they revert back . . . you know slip into what's natural for them." At least they were flexible! We could agree on that, anyway.

Jimmie did, in fact, play with Ruby occasionally, more times than he felt able to "remember." Ruby told me so, and another white boy, friendly to Ruby, confirmed it. I sometimes watched the children as they played in the school yard. It was hard for any of them to keep out of anyone else's way. The few white children who remained with Ruby during the hardest days of the boycott never wanted to keep away from her. For them she was a heroine, communicating excitement. She meant more attention from their teachers than they had ever had before. Even with mobs outside these white children and their one Negro schoolmate somehow pursued their studies.

What of this "heroine," this dark little girl of six whose parents had just come to New Orleans from an impoverished Mississippi farm? What of the three Negro girls who for a while attended an empty school, or those few young children who pioneered desegregation in several other schools in the city the next year? The games they play, the pictures they draw are in forceful counterpoint to Jimmie's, even to those white children who come from homes friendly to the idea of desegregation. I have been struck by how clearly young Negro children foresee the bleak future of their lives. With crayons, a medium of quiet eloquence, one often strikingly expressive, they draw a world of fear and foreboding, of worthlessness, of anticipated uselessness. "That means my daddy can't get a job because he's not right for it." I had asked Ruby to draw a picture of her daddy, and she had replied with one of a coal black man—her father was in fact rather light brown, but she was apparently determined to make her point that a miss is as good as a mile. She drew his arms small, without hands or fingers, and placed him under a rather gloomy and leafless tree.

The point at issue is not her absolute artistic skill, but her comparative feelings being translated into widely different representations of the world. This child could draw strong arms and well-proportioned bodies—but for whites only. Whites parade through these drawings with their thin lips and fine noses, blue eyes and blond hair, set in as well-appointed an environment as the child can represent with her budding skills. I asked little Ruby why she always colored white people's eyes and hair as she did (in those coloring books which would never think of admitting a Negro to their schools). She smiled and turned her head away without reply. I pointed out to her that my hair was not blond and my eyes were brown. She then answered with, "I don't know the white, except maybe for you, so I can't color their hair anything else." I wondered where she had learned the colors she could use, and she quickly listed the sources: her television set, calendars left by salesmen, movies, and those furtive glances which she described when she said, "I catches a look sometimes, real fast like."

In a world where they must peek around corners, these children came to know whites intimately only through their dolls. Yet, I recall a little girl in

(Continued on page 68)

"Now one of them was going to the Frantz school and the girl hoped the weather would clear."

Racial Identity

Continued from page 57

New Orleans who did have Negro dolls, but she kept them carefully segregated from her white dolls, and their separate careers were well established in her mind, the white mistress and the Negro servant, the white "bossman" and the Negro employee.

Such knowledge is obviously acquired from many sources, but most particularly and ironically, from the child's own parents. Negro parents are firm and abiding segregationists, and one of their chief tasks—or compulsions—is the necessary communication of a wide range of segregationist convictions to their young children. Yes, the segregationists are right, laws will not by themselves change human attitudes. But laws are extremely influential in determining them, and each of the children I have studied can recall his or her childhood encounter with the law and its meaning. "I just know I can't go there," a girl told me, and how she came to know her city's local ordinance involved spankings and threats not from her city or its police or judges, but from her mother, and especially from her father. "I had to drive it into her," he explained to me, "so I just did what you have to do and licked her until she knew." Older Negro youths recall such experiences in fleeting seconds when long hours of "civilizing" events are condensed in particular memories.

The outside world enforces its truths, the hopes and denials implied in its laws, through the sanctions of parents upon children. Or, put more bluntly by a Negro mother, "You have to let them know before they go out of their own backyard." At his peril the Negro child leaves his home for school if he has not learned where he can sit, or what he cannot do when he gets hungry or thirsty. At five, just as surely as at 15 or 25, he must know his "place." In fact, at five his awareness of this "place" is freshest. At fifteen these early perceptions have become reflexes, no longer even noticed, but merely used as the basis for some such formulation as this: "If I am in fact of law and custom restricted and proscribed, my worth is doubtful, my nature suspect."

Shame is not, however, the only response to being set apart and called "special" in a critical or condescending manner. Anger and a secret or open desire for vengeance may also develop. It takes a long time for some of this concealed rage to unfold itself with consistent lack of guarding. For instance, a boy of seven whom I had known for almost two years, himself a Negro, always drew Negroes without eyes or a mouth. Whites were carefully drawn. They were portrayed as capable of seeing and speaking. Negroes were defective, not free to use whatever inheritance nature had foolishly squandered upon them. One day the boy crossed out with a random stroke of the black crayon a white man he'd drawn just a moment before. He looked quickly and nervously at me, then he told me he didn't "mean" it. Of course he did, and of course it was necessary for him and me to have this matter out, so that he could learn that at least in this case it was possible for his feelings to be understood without fear or punishment; and, just as important, so that I could learn that he was not a placid child, unconcerned with matters of race, unafraid and satisfied with his lot. I suspect that our relationship, his and mine, had a wider educational relevance than either of us may have imagined. In our last meeting, the boy's voice recorded on tape this question, "Do you think the colored would be wiped out if we fought the white or can we beat them?" He saw me hesitate. The only reply I could make was my conviction that if it came to a physical fight there would be no winners or losers. Our chief hope, I went on to say, was that in place of a fight both whites and Negroes might grope toward an understanding of one another's feelings, in sketches, in quiet talks, and in play.

EASIER to find than deeper, prohibited hates are fears—though the two are closely connected. We hate what we fear, and our irrational fears bespeak a variety of hates. All our young Negro children studied have realized and expressed their sense of isolation, loneliness and vulnerability. Little Ruby will not only draw, but talk about her productions, and it is very important to hear from the mouth of this child what is happening in those pictures which represent her world. The drawing (page 57) is only the beginning of communication with her. She had been asked to picture her school, and she followed her work with the explanation that it was true that it was cloudy outside today, but she wanted it to be sunny the next day; and so she had tried hard to make it a pleasant day on paper. "It's so good out that the birds have come and one of them is even getting some crumbs from the school children." She had no more to add, but I knew she liked to draw birds, and I remembered other drawings in which she had pictured blue jays and cardinals, with a few blackbirds or larger crows interspersed, though they were always shown closer to the ground, lower in height or elevation. Now one of them was going to the Frantz School and the girl hoped the weather would clear.

With older children it is different: They do not draw their impulsive moments of truth, but in anticipation of growing up respond to the world with a whole set of postures and "roles" which tell us something of what they feel. Moreover their responses are more directly their own. When a white boy of sixteen says, "I don't like them" he is not simply obeying his parents, or accepting their feelings as his. Instead, he is making his own commitment. Six months later the same boy found the one Negro at his school "a good fellow." It was clearly his own life and experience which enabled him to make this exception. Eighteen months later he saw Negroes on his city's streets with compassion and he was troubled by how careful they had to be in doing many things he took for granted. That year and a half was a period when he himself was in the midst of growing, of feeling self-conscious and shy, uncertain about himself and what others thought of him. Out of his own life he could feel what a fellow student suffered, even if the fellow student was a Negro. His parents had given him his inheritance of their segregationist sentiments, but the very process of growing up was also his inheritance, and each generation has its own troubles and pleasures, and its own intense and newly discovered reality.

We see then that events in desegregation faithfully echo the various stages of human development. A Negro will often be a playmate to a white child of six because of the age they share with one another and in spite of the white child's knowledge of what his parents think about integration. Similarly, a Negro of seventeen will often emerge in the mind of a white classmate as a companion in trial and confusion despite the white youth's past opinions on race. Their age has generated its own feelings and convictions.

IT IS also very important to see how these private concerns merge imperceptibly into public ones. We are what we think and feel, and what we have been reared to think and feel. Yet, not just our families and their traditions affect us, but the whole world and its timely questions. School children share our dreams of landing on distant planets, or defying an assortment of assumptions about time and distance once conceived to be permanent. What were priorities of belief to our parents seem quaint to us today, or, in a white boy's comment to me: "Atlanta and Boston probably used to be the ends of the earth for people in the Civil War days, but when you're in orbit they look so close they could be in the same sandwich." We may know such facts, but we often forget the fact of their emotional significance in the lives of our children.

Negro children, too, must face the conflict of generations, the differences between their own possibilities and those hitherto known by their elders. Children who have learned to fear an oppressive white world are unlikely to receive consistent encouragement to see its changing nature from those very adults who taught them what they themselves all too accurately knew out of their own past experiences. Many older Negro children have fought not only reluctant school boards and brooding white classmates for their new recognition, but their own parents' fears and prohibitions as well. Many younger Negro children have been sent to white schools by parents who were determined and angry, but far from hopeful that their child would have an easy time of it. These parents have frequently learned to their own surpirse that the segregationists are indeed right: it is dangerous to allow young children to study and play close to one another. Such a policy leads to flagrant friendships, to letters and numbers learned and rehearsed together, to ropes jumped and tag played and color forgotten. "It's hard for me to believe," said a Negro mother to me, and she went on to say, "we sent her there because we felt someone had to do it, and it couldn't be worse than the way it is already for us; but we never expected for our Leona to have frineds from those kids." Such expressions were virtually repeated word for word to me by an Atlanta mother whose adolescent boy had defied her wishes: "His daddy and I both opposed his going through this, because we know what it's like to be a Negro, and the one thing we hoped for was to spare him the worst of it. But he's getting through it, and I suppose it's his life." In saying this she could scarcely have known how much her son's life had become part of our history.

The lives of many of the most passionate segregationists are also part of our nation's history. A majority of the white South would vote to oppose desegregation—they would also vote to oppose disorder on the streets—but only a few would give as much of their emotional energy and, ironically, their constant attention to the Negro and his containment as has a certain young lady of fifteen who lives in Atlanta. She is a bright, fair haired girl with a beautiful voice who sings regularly in church. In her heart she despises Negroes as lawless, reckless people whose promiscuity threatens her clear virtue. Their bodies, infected and soiled in her various fantasies, condition her actions—she always had to keep her distance from them—but also in a strange way they command her continual interest. ("They can't keep their eyes off us," one Negro girl said to describe the dedicated preoccupation of some of her classmates.)

AFTER two years with a Negro girl whose interest in music and religion were remarkably similar to her own, this white girl had not changed her convictions one bit. But if her racial beliefs were unaltered, she could not wipe away the persuasive influence of countless hours spent in the Negro girl's company at school. "It's coming, I know, and we can take a few of them like we did, but it can't get massive. One or two are like an innoculation, don't you think?" Replying to her medical imagery, I told her that by her own descriptions she had survived fairly well. I knew that she still was telling me that she disliked "them," even though she could hardly fear a girl who had clearly done her no harm. In short, she felt in some fashion healthier now. Negroes might still represent a disease for her, but she was now immune, or somewhat immune to its infection, or to whatever dangers this dark affliction evoked in her thinking.

While these children, white and Negro alike, have walked with their past lives to those embattled schools, they have in a sense begun to construct a future for themselves and for their generation. They have studied one another as well as their books, and they have not always learned the right answers from either. We send our young to school in some old and idealistic hope that they will learn the laws of the universe, learn to distinguish between facts and illusions, and thus become more able to comprehend the world honestly, openly and above all with no deadening sense of finality. These children have made a beginning in realizing part of this hope, and that, I suppose, is what education is about.

Los Angeles Times
LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 772,439 S. 1,120,153

OCT 20 1963

REPORT CARD

Survey to Study Link of Integration, Ability

By Dick Turpin, Times Education Editor

During the current school year, a study is planned to determine, if possible, the differences in achievement ability of students enrolled in an integrated school compared with those at a segregated school.

This is an area where little research exists and when it was suggested by J. C. Chambers, member of the Board of Education, it was received gingerly by the board. However, Dr. Hugh C. Willett, senior member, agreed that such a study, conducted carefully, would have great national significance.

In his recent "state of the schools" message, Jack P. Crowther, superintendent, gave the proposal high priority for the current school year, giving heed at the same time to complexities involved in carrying out such a unique survey. Selection of control group students, areas of examination and numbers of students to be included, for instance, would have to figure in criteria for the study.

Into this sensitive picture have come results of a two-year study of the effects of desegregation on participating Negro and white students in eight Southern cities.

A summary report, published by the Southern Regional Council and the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, shows these major findings in "The Desegregation of Southern Schools: A Psychiatric Study," conducted by Dr. Robert Coles, an Atlanta, Ga., child psychiatrist:

1 — Some "segregationist" children change their attitudes toward Negro children after attending school with them for a year.

participating Negro and white students in eight Southern cities.

A summary report, published by the Southern Regional Council and the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, shows these major findings in "The Desegregation of Southern Schools: A Psychiatric Study," conducted by Dr. Robert Coles, an Atlanta, Ga., child psychiatrist:

1 — Some "segregationist" children change their attitudes toward Negro children after attending school with them for a year.

2—Negro children find attendance in white schools "stressful but not incapacitating."

3—White children in desegregated southern schools suffer no "medical or psychiatric damage" and no "breakdown in ability to work, study and get along with friends."

4—Children of both races continue their studies "without impairment."

5 — From an academic viewpoint, desegregation is easier in elementary grade schools.

Copies of the study are available from the League, 515 Madison Ave., New York 22, N.Y., or from the council, 5 Forsyth St. N.W., Atlanta 3, Ga.

Parents for Better Education, volunteer educational organization, was cast in a false role in a Times account last week of a State Board of Education meeting.

A spokesman for the PBE was denied permission to speak by Tom Braden, board president, on grounds that the PBE subject for discussion—Braden himself—was "not pertinent to the board's agenda." He explained that he also had turned away two other persons who wished to address the board,

One person wanted to duscuss Braden's "bad influence" on schools, Braden said, while the other wanted to warn against the 'bad influence" the American Legion had upon schools. Neither person was from the PBE but in the printed version, both were inadvertently identified with the PBE.

Braden and the PBE have been at odds since recent allegations by the organization that the state board is lax in its procedures governing restoration of credentials to teachers with criminal records. The board has denied any laxity.

The PBE, after being denied permission to address the board, issued a statement challenging recent remarks by Braden that the PBE wanted to bring about "a state of censorship in the public schools," a charge denied by PBE.

The Greensboro Record
GREENSBORO, N, C.
D. 31,743

OCT 21 1963

Grant of $1,500 Earmarked

Voter Education Project In City Given Support From NAACP

Greensboro chapter of National Association for the Advancement of Colored People has received a grant of $1,500 from Southern Regional Council of Atlanta to conduct a voter education project in the city, Dr. George Simkins Jr., president of the chapter, said today.

The funds will be used in a 90-day voter registration campaign to be launched Sunday in connection with the fall rally of the chapter at 8 p.m. at St. James Presbyterian Church on Ross Avenue.

Speaker for the event will be Dr. Edwin R. Edmonds, pastor of Dixwell Congregational Church in New Haven, Conn. Dr. Edmonds, former sociology professor at Bennett College, served as president of the local chapter of NAACP when he was in Greensboro.

Dr. Simkins said that cochairman for the voter registration campaign will be Charles I. Brown and B. J. Battle. The fund of the Southern Regional Council, from which the $1,500 allocation was made to the local NAACP chapter, is made up from contributions from philanthropic organizations and from individuals interested in human relations problems. The funds are to be granted to groups working in areas of human relations.

Dr. Simkins said that the local NAACP chapter made application for a grant to conduct the voter registration campaign here and was awarded the funds. The money will be used to circulate voter education material, provide secretarial help in assembling information on and results of the project and carrying on the campaign.

Members of the local chapter of the Congress of Racial Equality will assist with the project, Dr. Simkins said.

The NAACP chapter has conducted a number of voter registration campaigns in the past.

At Sunday's NAACP meeting, Rev. A. Knighton Stanley, director of the United Southern Christian Fellowship Foundation, will discuss "Implications of the Social Revolution in Greensboro."

Awards will be presented to NAACP members who registered the largest number of members in a recent membership campaign. Dr. Simkins said membership of the local chapter now stands at 2,000, of which 500 are new members.

Joseph Mitchell was chairman of the membership committee. Members of St. James choir will furnish music for the event.

ATLANTA, GA.
WORLD
D. 29,800 (N)

OCT 23 1963

ELEANOR

A Men's Day To Remember
(Dr. Lucius H. Pitts, Featured Speaker)

Members and friends of the Ebenezer Baptist Church, co-pastored by two illustrious leaders, the Rev. Martin Luther King, Sr. and Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., will long remember Men's Day, October 13, 1963. For the noted minister-educator Dr. Lucius H. Pitts, President of Miles College was the featured speaker.

Dr. Pitts, beloved, well-prepared and widely known as a great educator currently serving as President of Miles College, Birmingham, Ala., and as a member of numerous boards and committees including the Advisory Committee of the Federal Civil Rights Commission, the Board of Directors of the Southern Regional Council and the National Council of Churches of Christ in the U.S.A. was introduced to the over-flowing audience by the now famous Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. As we all remember, Dr. Pitts for several years served very efficiently as Executive Secretary of the Georgia Teachers Education Association. He has made his influence felt by thousands and especially in the city of Birmingham. He has served as a negotiator and supporter of every effort for justice and freedom for all citizens. With the aid of many citizens (both white and colored) Dr. Pitts as president of Miles College is working wonders to build a greater Miles College.

Dr. Pitts chose as his subject "What Is Man?"

As an answer to this question the impressive prelate quoted from many great thinkers—philosophers, poets, sociologists, biologists, chemists, teachers and then ultimately from the Bible. "Man is but a little lower than the angels, etc." Dr. Pitts reviewed briefly the Birmingham story, lamenting recent occurrances there. But he lifted his huge audience (including white citizens also) to optimistic heights when he reviewed the long, rugged road traveled by not only the courageous American Negroes but great-hearted white people who can and do embrace the fullest moral and spiritual concept for American Democracy. "This is the kind of a spiritual order to build a world as God intended; Man must be measured not solely by degrees, I.Q. tests, etc., but principally by highest moral standards and by his ability to follow the truth," emphasized the great educator. Being a little lower than the angels, man is given power to create the atmosphere and strength to change the universe. Angels will guide his feet if he will only believe, keep the faith, pray, work and strive fervently to do God's will." The New Breed Man (both black and white) is catching on!

OTHER COMMENTS ON MEN'S DAY

Music for Men's Day at the 10:45 a.m. services was rendered by the Men's Chorus under the auspices of efficient Mr. David C. Stills, Jr., director. Among the beautiful and thrilling numbers rendered were Milner's Diathyramb, Dupre's Antiphon No. 5, Ezekiel Saw The Wheel and Ward's All Hail The Power of Jesus' Name. The latter number was most uniquely rendered in that the voices of three young boys blended so intriguingly with the older voices—thus producing the effect of a mixed choral number. The 8 p.m. services at which Deacon Henry Wallace presided proved to be quite a treat. A gospel song feast was highlighted by the impressive and enjoyable voices of Mrs. Mary Gurley and her brother, Mr. Eugene Harris.

Thus ended one of the finest Men's Days ever observed.

The Virginian-Pilot
NORFOLK, VA.
D. 119,187

OCT 22 1963

No Hope For Segregation

Race Walls Tumble in South

NORFOLK — Dr. James McBride Dabbs, president of the Southern Regional Council on Human Relations, said Monday the South is on the verge of "integrating its society in a deeper sense than has yet appeared in this country."

Speaking at the first meeting of the newly reorganized Norfolk Human Relations Council in Talbot Hall, Dr. Dabbs said the South has always been interested in "people as people and in the individual," and the job of Southerners now is to "take the age-old interest of the South and purify it, extend it across racial lines."

To do this, he said, whites and Negroes must meet as people, before the Negroes are forced to direct action and demonstration through apathy on the part of whites, he said.

BASIC WEAKNESS

The normal procedure, he said, is for whites to meet with Negroes after demonstrations.

"The weakness of this confrontation is its antagonistic, unfriendly nature: it's our crowd against your crowd," he said.

"It is true that in such conflicts purely worldly justice is hammered out: they are necesary to the attainment of justice. But there is possible a happier confrontation before the crisis arises," he added.

Dr. Dabbs, author of many articles on the racial situation in the South, and of "Our Southern Heritage," said the cause of segregationists is almost dead.

NO HOPE

"These men cannot really hope (to maintain segregation); and no man deeply wants what he cannot hope for," he said.

"Segregation may have had some negotiability when it was first issued, but the institution now is bankrupt."

Human relations councils, he said, try to "formalize and extend the southerner's deep sense of human beings, of human relationships."

In the past the South has trusted "too much to one-to-one personal relationships, and too little to the social structure in which those relationships occur," he said. "The white has often wished the Negro well . . . but the white has not been concerned to structure a social order in which the Negro has an equal chance of meeting the hardships and winning the awards of earth."

NOT EASY

Dr. Dabbs said establishing such a social order would not be easy. "I do not predict the early coming of the Kingdom of Heaven," he said.

But human relations councils "are one of the important organs of this movement," he said; "they are attempting to bring people together on the human level, regardless of race or religion."

About 60 people attended the meeting Monday night. Mrs. H. M. Silverman and Mrs. C. P. Wisoff were elected cochairmen of the Norfolk Human Relations Council. The group was organized in 1959 but became inactive about three years ago.

Mrs. Wisoff told members the newly reorganized council that a full program of speakers is scheduled for monthly meetings throughout the winter.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
BLACK DISPATCH
W. 9,000 (N)
OCT 25 1963

JIMMY Says

by Jimmy Stewart

Mummers Theatre will present its classic production of the season, "Antigone," comes Wednesday, October 30. It is the Jean Anouilh version, translated from the French, of the Sophocles play of early Greek drama. Performances are nightly at 8:30 through Nov. 24, with two Sunday shows running earlier at 2:30 and 7:30 p.m. Tickets may be purchased through mail by writing the theatre at 1108 West Main, or calling for reservations after 10 a.m. at CE 5-3359.

Mr. Marshall Gamble was elected president and Mr. Theodore McCormick, vice president, of the Boley branch NAACP Sunday. The revived Boley branch has a county-wide membership campaign on, and to date has nearly 100 members. Branch officials plan to hold public meetings in various communities within Okfuskee county in order to take the program of NAACP to the people. The next meeting will be held at 4 p.m. Sunday, Nov. 3.

Today we would call him a teenager, this North Carolina boy who joined the King's Royal Rifles to fight in World War I . . . and today as we read of his reactions, and the viewpoint with which he emerged from that holocaust, we find that we still have much to learn of Righteous Causes, of synthetic hatreds, and of compassion for our fellowman.

He is Col. Benjamin Muse, a Tarheel who has served his country in the capacity of soldier and civilian and for the past five years has served as director of the Southern Leadership Project of the Southern Regional Council (SRC). His recent book, "Tarheel Tommy Atkins," is a moving profile of the calamity that is war. Written with vigor, factual accuracy and an immediacy that gives it dramatic impact, it is a story filled with surprises which we recommend for your reading pleasure. Vantage Press, 120 West 31st St., New York 1, N. Y.

Funeral services were held at Idabel recently for Jimmy Mehardy, a longtime driver and employee of Dr. H. W. Williamston. He passed in Oklahoma City where he had made his home the past five years. . . . The State Baptist Convention is meeting at Muskogee through Sunday afternoon . . . Friends of Sen. Fred R. Harris of Lawton are sponsoring an Appreciation Birthday Dinner for the Sage of Comanche county here at the Homebuilders Building comes Nov. 14. Senator Harris was the author of the bill in the last legislature which established the State Commission on Human Relations.

Beta Eta Lambda chapter of Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity will sponsor the annual trek to our city of Ebony's fabulous fashion show comes Friday, Nov. 22. There are 18 persons involved in the production this year and we're told the publisher's wife was active in select-factual accuracy and an immediacy that gives it dramatic impact, it is a story filled with surprises which we recommend for your reading pleasure. Vantage Press, 120 West 31st St., New York 1, N. Y.

Funeral services were held at Idabel recently for Jimmy Mehardy, a longtime driver and employee of Dr. H. W. Williamston. He passed in Oklahoma City where he had made his home the past five years. . . . The State Baptist Convention is meeting at Muskogee through Sunday afternoon . . . Friends of Sen. Fred R. Harris of Lawton are sponsoring an Appreciation Birthday Dinner for the Sage of Comanche county here at the Homebuilders Building comes Nov. 14. Senator Harris was the author of the bill in the last legislature which established the State Commission on Human Relations.

Beta Eta Lambda chapter of Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity will sponsor the annual trek to our city of Ebony's fabulous fashion show comes Friday, Nov. 22. There are 18 persons involved in the production this year and we're told the publisher's wife was active in selecting the wardrobe following the death of Freida DeKnight. The show will be in Douglass Auditorium where everybody will be able to lamp the models to their heart's delight.

One never knows what the sense of values of others are. This week, Henry Hailey, one of my churchmen and a veteran bellman at the Skirvin Tower Hotel, sent me a reprint of a column by Eugene Patterson, "A Flower for the Graves," from the Sept. 16, 1963 Atlanta Constitution newspaper. Fortunately I had received a copy earlier through the Southern Regional Council which gave it wide distribution. Mr. Patterson is editor of this great Southern newspaper, and in this article places the guilt for the bombing of a Baptist church in Birmingham which caused the death of four little innocent Negro girls where he thinks it belongs.

I hope you will take the time to look elsewhere on this page and read a reprint of this article. It is reassuring to many who think or say "All is bad in Dixie," to know that good is, and may come from Nazareth. Thank you, Mr. Hailey, for a reminder of an obligation which we of the Fourth Estate should always abide by and cherish—to give light rather than heat on all issues of public interest. Also on the question of sense of values, this writer must admit we've never chosen to hear Negro bandleader Sam Cooke during his numerous appearances in our city. However, last week his actions in Shreveport, La., while attempting to register at a so-called white motel and subsequent arrest on charges of "disturbing the peace" added one more member to his fan club, and we're proud of him.

There won't be much "cutting up" around local hospitals next week because our Drs. Charles A. Tollett and Louis J. Bernard will attend the annual session of the American College of Surgeons at San Francisco, Oct. 28-Nov. 1 . . . The Langston Lions gave Northeastern a run for the money during the first half of their encounter at Guthrie Saturday night, but freshman inexperience and questionable judgment told off on us in the last two quarters. I never will be able to understand that pass play called on the 6-yard line with first and goal to go for a touchdown which would have put the Lions ahead in the third quarter. However, I'm only a drug store quarterback and will travel down to Ft. Worth, Saturday, to see if the Lions can twist the tail of Bishop's Bears. This is a day game at Farthington Field, so don't show up at 6:00 p.m. and expect to cheer for Langston . . . The Douglass Trojans play Northwest Classen at Douglass Stadium Friday night. Game time is 8:00 p.m. . . . The caucus of city organizations had a very interesting meeting with representatives of the Civil Service Commission of this district from Dallas, Texas, this week. We hope the results of this frank discussion of problems in employment will be beneficial and have meaningful results in the months and years ahead.

And so until next week, Jimmy Says the Citizens' Chamber of Commerce, after hearing all of the issues in a public forum with our mayor and other officials of the Advance Oklahoma City Committee, voted to endorse the earnings tax measure which citizens of our city will be asked to vote on next Tuesday, Octobber 29.

There are many reasons why we should favor this proposal to raise revenue for our city primarily because we think it is the most equitable, in that it affords an opportunity for the banker to drop his load as well as the widow to give her mite toward the general welfare of all. Prices of bread and milk go up periodically and although none of us relish the thought of paying more, we do it. Why not assume the responsibility for increased city expenses, which should be our common duty? Vote "Yes" Tuesday.

MONTGOMERY, ALA.
ADVERTISER
D. 66,623 S. 87,189

OCT 25 1963

Tuskegee Institute To Honor Farley, Four Others During 2-Day Convocation

TUSKEGEE — Five Americans including one of the major political figures in Democratic politics will be given honorary degrees Saturday during a convocation at Tuskegee Institute slated Friday and Saturday.

Leading the delegation of five to be honored is James A. Farley, chairman of the Coca Cola Export Corp., and postmaster general during the Roosevelt administration. He is from New York City.

Others are Whitney Young, executive director of the Urban League; Gerald Piel, publisher of Scientific American; Dr. Buell Gallagher, president of City College of New York; and George Warren, member of the Tuskegee Institute board of trustees.

Lucius D. Battle, assistant secretary of state for cultural affairs, will address the convocation.

In all, nearly 500 leaders in education, government, industry, labor and community affairs will participate in the two-day conference.

The group will analyze the problems and report to the nation on the elimination of disadvantage for all Americans in the areas of education, economic development and civic participation.

A summary of the conference and full report will be published early next year.

L. H. Foster, president of Tuskegee Institute, said the conference will be held in conjunction with the annual meeting of the institute's board of trustees.

Dr. Eli Ginzberg, professor of economics, graduate school of business, Columbia University, will read an opening paper on "American and the Negro."

Included among the participants in the conference are Dr. Joseph Douglass of the U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare; Dr. Roger D. Heyns, vice president of the University of Michigan; James Dumpson, New York City Commissioner of Welfare; Arthur Chapin of the U.S. Departmnet of Labor; Dr. Hylan Lewis of the Health and Welfare Council of Washington, D.C.; Dr. Carl Marburger, director, Greater Cities Project, Detroit, Mich.; Professor Donald Bogue of the University of Chicago; and James M. Dabbs, president of the Souhern Regional Council.

ATLANTA, GA.
CONSTITUTION
D. 202,635

OCT 29 1963

Pat Watters Takes Post with Region Council

Atlanta Journal columnist Pat Watters has resigned to become information director for the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta.

Watters, who has written a column for The Journal since July 1961, began his new job at council headquarters Monday.

Before he started his column, Watters was city editor of The Journal for two years, and a staff reporter before that. A native of Spartanburg, S.C., he attended public schools in Albany, Brunswick and Atlanta and received degrees from Emory University and the State University of Iowa.

ATLANTA, GA.
JOURNAL
D. 259,003

OCT 28 1963

Watters Takes Information Post Here

Pat Watters, columnist for The Atlanta Journal, has resigned to become information director for the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta.

Pat Watters

Mr. Watters assumed his new duties at council headquarters Monday.

He had written a column for The Atlanta Journal since July, 1961.

Before becoming a newspaper columnist, Mr. Watters was city editor of The Atlanta Journal for two years, and before that he was a staff reporter.

A native of Spartanburg. S.C., he attended public school in Albany, Brunswick and Atlanta.

He received an A.B. in journalism degree from Emory University in 1951. While at Emory, he was editor of the Emory Wheel and a member of Chi Phi social fraternity, Phi Beta Kappa, Sigma Delta Chi, ODK, and the senior honor society.

He later took a masters degree in journalism from the State University of Iowa.

While an Atlanta Journal reporter, he covered a variety of assignments — DeKalb County, Fulton County, and the State Capitol among them. His reporting won a number of awards.

Mr. Watters, who is 36, is married to the former Miss Cecile Rhinehart, and they have two children.

The Miami Herald
MIAMI, FLA.
D. 342,056 S. 394,039

OCT 31 1963

The Town Crier

BY Jack Bell

United Fund's residential campaign opens officially Sunday, Nov. 10. But two nights earlier there'll be a huge kick-off pa[illegible] at Miami Springs Villas plus a 30-minute simulcast starting at 11:15 p.m. Nov. 8 and featuring Miami's three top TV newscasters, Ralph Renick, WTVJ; Wayne Fariss, WCKT, and Paul Frank, WLBW.

BELL

The three newscasters will work up their big show prior to the time it appears on the air. They'll film Gen. E. A. Evans, campaign chairman; Gladys Washington (Miss Torch) and her court; 16-month-old Christine Foster, the '63 poster girl, and several other leaders of various other UF activities. The goal, to serve 40 agencies, is $3,008,838. The broadcast will be shown on all three TV stations.

★ ★ ★

'Crisis' Topic

"Crisis around the Corner" will be the topic at the annual dinner of the Council on Human Relations at Biscayne Terrace Hotel Wednesday evening. Mrs. H. Franklin Williams, executive director, has obtained Paul Anthony, field director of the Southern Regional Council, to speak on integrated housing. The Rev. Theodore Gibson, president of Miami NAACP, also will speak.

Miami's record for quiet tolerance during the widespread string of riots in other cities is exemplary. But still, there may be a crisis around the corner.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA.
FLORIDA STAR
W. 22,391 (N)
NOV 2 1963

Politics As Usual

BY ERIC O. SIMPSON

Racial Tensions Unscored In Negroes Jobs - Scarcity

The need of Negro Americans, and particularly of Negro Southerners, for more and better jobs is underscored by economist Vivian W. Henderson in a short study, The Economic Status of the Negro: In The Nation and In the South, published recently by the Southern Regional Council.

Vivian Henderson is professor and chairman of the Department of Economics and Business Administration at Fisk University. He is currently serving as a visiting professor at North Carolina State College in Raleigh.

SIMPSON

Despite gains made since World War II, Dr. Henderson finds "little cause for optimism regarding rapid change in the status of Negroes in the near future."

"Tensions generated by poor race relations are not conductive to economic growth," Henderson also warns. "Chaos over school desegregation, boycotts to achieve employment opportunity, sit-in demonstrations, and picket lines, all are simply and tragically inimical to the economic life of the region. Positive steps toward good race relations, the full absorption of Negroes into the mainstream of the region -- these are imperative to leadership seeking a healthy South."

While the income of Negro families and individuals nationally has grown over five times since 1940, it is still "little more than one-half" that of American white families and individuals.

Moreover, Dr. Henderson points out, "in the South Negro families have an income of less than one-half (46%) that of white families and only one-half the income" of non-southern negroes.

This fact, says Henderson, explains "why Negroes have stepped up their efforts to for optimism regarding rapid change in the status of Negroes in the near future.''

''Tensions generated by poor race relations are not conductive to economic growth,'' Henderson also warns. ''Chaos over school desegregation, boycotts to achieve employment opportunity, sit-in demonstrations, and picket lines, all are simply and tragically inimical to the economic life of the region. Positive steps toward good race relations, the full absorption of Negroes into the mainstream of the region -- these are imperative to leadership seeking a healthy South.''

While the income of Negro families and individuals nationally has grown over five times since 1940, it is still ''little more than one-half'' that of American white families and individuals.

Moreover, Dr. Henderson points out, ''in the South Negro families have an income of less than one-half (46%) that of white families and only one-half the income'' of non-southern negroes.

This fact, says Henderson, explains ''why Negroes have stepped up their efforts to speed school desegregation, which, in large part, derives from efforts to secure a better break economically.''

The proportion of Negro families with incomes between $4,000 and $6,000 tripled between 1941 and 1961, and the number of Negro families with incomes of more than $6,000 grew from 4% to 20% during the same period.

But the Henderson study shows that these gains occurred between 1940 and 1954. Since that time, the income gap between Negroes and whites has widened.

''Negroes are losing ground rapidly in gaining dollar parity with whites,'' according to Dr. Henderson, and ''earnings are increasing for whites at a faster pace than for Negroes.''

With employment among Negroes today twice that of whites and the duration of unemployment longer for Negroes than for whites, Dr. Henderson notes that the industries which have ''a declining rate of employment are the industries which have absorbed Negroes.'' These include mining, manufacturing, and construction, where Negroes have found unskilled and semi-skilled jobs as laborers and operatives.

''There has not been a large penetration by Negroes into the growth sectors of employment. These industries and occupations where Negroes have gained in employment represent the slow growth areas of the economy and labor market.''

In discussing the losses to the national economy through racial discrimination, Dr. Henderson concluded, extrapolating from government estimates, that ''the South loses from $5 to $6 billion annually because of racial discrimination.''

Accordingly, the economist warns that ''rapid adjustments'' must be made by the South if it expects to enjoy continued economic progress.

The Southern Regional Council is an organization of white and Negro Southerners formed in 1944 to advance ''equal opportunity for all the South's people.''

The Miami Herald
MIAMI, FLA.
D. 342,056 S. 394,039

NOV 1 1963

Discrimination Dinner Topic

A discussion of discrimination still existing in Dade County will highlight Wednesday the annual banquet of the Greater Miami chapter, Florida Council on Human Relations. It will begin at 7 p.m. at the Biscayne Terrace Hotel.

Speakers will be Rev. Theodore Gibson, local president of the NAACP, and Paul Anthony, field director of the Southern Regional Council.

DAILY
Chicago Defender
WORLD'S GREATEST WEEKLY
D. 22,249

NOV 5 1963

Equality Next Hurdle For Negro: Professor

TUSKEGEE INSTITUTE, Ala.—"Even when full political rights have been achieved, most Negroes will still be unable to cope successfully with the better educated, more socially stable white population with higher income," a Columbia University Professor of Economics said here last week.

One of six distinguished American scholars addressing the opening session of the Tuskegee Conference on Disadvantage," Dr. Eli Ginzberg state: "The Negroes search for equality will be difficult. Political power, legal redress, and civil agitation are likely to speed the Negro toward this goal, but equality will still be far off.

He urged an audience of Leaders in education, government, industry, labor and community affairs to "stop thinking of 20 million Negroes as one large uneducated, poverty-stricken, disadvantaged mass," indicating that more white men and women than Negroes are handicapped by an impoverished background.

He outlined a five-point program to help those who need help through improved education and training programs; expanded employment; establishment of new health and welfare programs and better housing.

Earlier at the conference, Tuskegee Board of Trustees Chairman Basil O'Connor said that the United States needs a "Marshall Plan for Negroes" to help equip them for life in a totally integrated society.

Other papers presented at the two-day conference were those of: James M. Dabbs, president of the Southern Regional Council; Dr. Donald J. Bogue, professor at the University of Chicago; Dr. Vivian Henderson, visiting professor at North Carolina State College; Dr. Carl Marburger, director of the Great Cities Project, Detroit, Mich.; and Dr. L. H. Foster, president Tuskegee Institute.

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D.C.
D. 408,701 S. 491,212

NOV 6 1963

Defense Dept. Tied To 'Biased' Agency On Equal Job Study

By Mike Causey

A member of a House subcommittee yesterday charged the Defense Department with awarding more than $100,000 in contracts to a "biased" organization to study equal employment opportunity.

Rep. Albert W. Watson (D-S.C.), said the Potomac Institute of Washington, a group dedicated to eliminate discrimination, couldn't be expected to give an unbiased report on the implementation of President Kennedy's Executive Order barring racial discrimination in firms under contract from the Defense Department.

He said the organization's president, Stephen Currier, "is a fund raising coordinator for CORE, the NAACP and other civil rights groups."

Rep. Morris K. Udall (D-Ariz.) said the progress of the hearing "disturbs me—maybe there are some evil implications here, but I haven't seen any." He asked members to reserve judgment until the hearings are completed.

Harold C. Fleming, executive vice president of the Institute, said later that the study was made entirely within the framework of the President's Executive Order. "We weren't asked to advise about policy, we were only asked to deliver recommendations on means by which this policy could be implemented," he said.

Fleming, a former director of the Southern Regional Council of Atlanta, said he felt the Institute "was capable of and did give impartial recommendations to the Defense Department."

He said it was incorporated in March, 1961, to "work within the framework of the President's Executive Order. "We weren't asked to advise about policy, we were only asked to deliver recommendations on means by which this policy could be implemented," he said.

Fleming, a former director of the Southern Regional Council of Atlanta, said he felt the Institute "was capable of and did give impartial recommendations to the Defense Department."

He said it was incorporated in March, 1961, to "work through educational methods for the elimination of prejudice and discrimination and the securing of human and civil rights."

It engages in various research and fact-finding programs and consultative services. It has been used by Federal agencies, including the Civil Rights Commission, and private organizations to develop programs to assure equal treatment of minority groups.

The Institute recommended that Army, Navy and Air Force hire outside specialists in intergroup relations to help implement the equal employment program in the Defense Department.

Rep. Watson, along with Reps. H. R. Gross (R-Iowa) and August E. Johansen (R-Mich.) repeatedly asked Norman S. Paul, assistant secretary of Defense for manpower, why the study was not conducted "in house" by Defense people.

Paul said it was first concluded "that qualified persons outside the Air Force should conduct the study because the necessary expertise was not available within the Department." He said Philip Hammer, a part-time consultant with the Air Force, who is now a non-salaried member of the Institute's board of directors, recommended Potomac Institute for the study.

Later, the Army and Navy also concluded they did not have "the necessary expertise" to conduct the survey and they also contracted with the Institute.

Rep. Gross said it is a "sad commentary on the Defense Department" that it could not find the necessary expertise among its millions of military and civilian people.

Rep. Charles H. Wilson (D-Calif.) asked that representatives of the Potomac Institute be brought before the subcommittee. Chairman David Henderson (D-N.C.) said the matter would be discussed in closed session, probably sometime this week.

The subcommittee probing manpower utilization plans to quiz Defense officials again today. Thursday it will hear witnesses from the Post Office Department regarding the controversial promotion of three Negro clerks to supervisory jobs in Dallas.

The Atlanta Journal
"COVERS DIXIE LIKE THE DEW"
D. 259,003

NOV 6 1963

GOP Solon Hits Civil Rights Group

By MARGARET SHANNON
Atlanta Journal Washington Correspondent

WASHINGTON, Nov. 6—A Republican congressman said Wednesday a civil rights research group that got $106,000 in Defense Department contracts seemed to have been set up to cash in on President Kennedy's antidiscrimination drive.

But a Democratic congressman protested that there is "not one shred of evidence" that the group, the Potomac Institute, Inc., was trying to "ride a gravy train."

The institute, which is run by a former Atlantan, was under scrutiny for the second straight day of a House subcommittee inquiring into "reverse" racial discrimination.

REP. August E. Johansen, R-Mich., suggested what he called a "hypothesis" about the Potomac Institute, which testimony has shown was set up about five weeks before it was recommended for a trouble-shooting job for the Defense Department, growing out of complaints of racial discrimination at the Lockheed plant in Marietta.

Rep. Johansen said it appeared that Potomac Institute officials might have known that a field was opening up for race relations work for the federal government. He said the institute looked to him like "a product of planned parenthood."

But Rep. Morris Udall, D-Ariz., protested that the institute could not be making much money because it is a nonprofit corporation that under the law can't legally make a profit.

HE SAID that some people don't think the President's program of equal employment opportunity is a good idea. But he said it seemed proper to him that persons sympathetic with the President's program ought to undertake the sort of work the Potomac Institute did for the Defense Department.

The institute has had three contracts. Two related to recommendations for implementing the equal employment program among defense contractors in private industry.

The third concerned ending job bias within the Defense Department itself.

THE POTOMAC Institute was set up in the spring of 1961 for the purpose of working "to eliminate discrimination and advance equal opportunity for all Americans.

Harold C. Fleming, former director of the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta, as its executive vice president.

Asst. Defense Sec. Norman S. Paul told the manpower utilization subcommittee of the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee that he considers the work of the institute for the Defense Department "worth while."

Ralph Horton Jr., director of the department's equal employment program, said the Potomac Institute reports were "of great help" in implementing the president's program.

REP. Albert W. Watson, D-S.C., charged that the institute was "a paper corporation" with no staff, except Mr. Fleming, when it received its first contract from the Defense Department.

He charged that it got the job because a former Atlantan friend of Mr. Fleming's, Philip Hammer, an economics consultant, recommended the institute. Mr. Hammer, according to previous testimony, was hired as a consultant on a daily basis by the Defense Department in the spring of 1961, when the problems at Lockheed came up.

Mr. Paul said Mr. Hammer received fees totaling about $650, plus $435 in travel expenses, for advising the Air Force as to what to do about the Lockheed situation.

Mr. Paul said the Air Force acted after receiving 32 complaints of discriminatory practices at Lockheed.

MONCKS CORNER, S.C.
BERKELEY DEMOCRAT
W. 2,000

NOV 6 1963

Jenkins Reports 144 Negroes Registered Monday

Esau Jenkins, President of the Citizens Committee of Charleston County, and the Coordinator of South Wide Voter Education program of the Southern Regional Council of Atlanta, Georgia, announced Monday that 144 Negroes had registered in Berkeley County on that date. Two duplicates and three corrected address registration blanks were issued.

The persons registering represented the following areas: Huger, Pineville, Wando, Cross, Cordesville, Moncks Corner, Russellville, St. Stephen, Honey Hill, Shulerville, Bonneau, and Eutawville.

ATLANTA, GA.
WORLD
D. 29,800 (N)

NOV 6 1963

New Registrants Of DeKalb County To Be Feted Nov. 17

Sunday, November 17, has been declared as appreciation day for the more than 1,500 new registrants of DeKalb County. The highlight of the program will be the address, Mr. Randolph Blackwell, Director of Field Activities for Voter Education Projects of Southern Regional Council.

The appreciation program will take place at the Thankful Baptist Church 427 Atlanta Ave., Decatur, Rev. Leon Tucker pastor. W. C. Patton, NAACP Field Secretary of Voter Registration, will present the awards. Music will be furnished by the DeKalb County Youth Council Choir.

After 10 successful weeks of work in the County, accroding to the director the Office at 307 Marshall Street, Deecatur, will be open in the evening for special transportation to persons registering. Time for the Appreciation program is 6:30 p.m. Miss Rosetta William is Director, and Rev. W. Moseley General Chairman.

LAFATETTE, LA.
SOUTHWEST LOUISIANA
REGISTER
W. 24,953 (C)
NOV 7 1963

Leaders Air Farm, Emplo

By Peggy Siegmund

Baton Rouge — "Leaders of today face the frustration of a rapidly changing world," began Dr. T. T. Williams, agricultural economist at Southern university, Baton Rouge, in his keynote address at the Social Leadership course, Oct. 25-27, sponsored by Southern Consumers cooperative.

Dr. Williams cited the two major problems to economic progress in our time as unemployment and rural deterioration.

Part of the unemployment problem stems from change in the labor market, Dr. Williams said, with automation requiring more and more skilled laborers. He explained that 5½ per cent of the working population was unemployed according to general averages of the past five years. The trend of school dropouts Dr. Williams traced to lack of motivation because of the unemployment problem among young people.

"One out of ten people on the farms will stay there," he explained, referring to the second major economic problem of rural deterioration. "Farm employment dropped a half million last year," he continued. "Four million people in the rural areas are unemployed all or part of the year. The cooperative approach can help to revitalize our rural areas."

Held at Southern university, the social leadership course was sponsored by the Southern Consumers cooperative, and aimed at developing leadership and helping members acquire a basic knowledge of economics as related to cooperatives. South-

At Leadership Course

Looking over national co-op literature at a recent social leadership course are (left to right) Dr. Robert A. Rennie, vice president of research for Nationwide Insurance company; Lester Scurlock, New Iberia, board of directors member of Southern Consumers cooperative; Una Mae Hargrave, Lafayette, educational committee of SCC; Ocie Smith, Sr., field representative for National Sharecroppers Fund, Inc.

Employment Problems

red by Southern Consumers operative.

Dr. Williams cited the two ajor problems to economic ogress in our time as unemployment and rural deterioration.

Part of the unemployment oblem stems from change in e labor market, Dr. Williams id, with automation requiring re and more skilled laborers. explained that 5½ per cent the working population was employed according to gener averages of the past five ars. The trend of school drops Dr. Williams traced to lack motivation because of the unployment problem among ng people.

"One out of ten people on the ms will stay there," he exired, referring to the second jor economic problem of rur deterioration. "Farm employnt dropped a half million last r," he continued. "Four mil people in the rural areas unemployed all or part of year. The cooperative apach can help to revitalize rural areas."

eld at Southern university, social leadership course was nsored by the Southern Conners cooperative, and aimed developing leadership and ping members acquire a basknowledge of economics as ted to cooperatives. Southern Consumers co-op is a statewide cooperative movement to help Negro families raise their economic standard of living.

Over twenty leaders in the co-op attended the weekend, including board of director members and chairmen from various towns throughout Louisiana.

Besides Dr. Williams, speakers for the weekend course included Dr. Jessie Gloster, economics professor, Texas Southern university, Houston, and Dr. Robert A. Rennie, vice president of research for Nationwide Insurance company.

Dr. Rennie conducted several sessions on social leadership as well as the basic economics of cooperation. He stressed the quality of understanding people, their similarities and differences, as basic to a good leader.

"The old concept of authority and leadership," Dr. Rennie said, "involved fear, force and authority. The new ideas on leadership now emphasize persuasion, satisfaction and reward."

In the old concept, Dr. Rennie explained, the leader said "I have a right to lead," while the new leader says, "I have a responsibility to guide."

Since Southern Consumers co-op plans to begin a finance company in the near future, as their first cooperative venture, Dr. Gloster spoke on basic principles and ideas for beginning a finance company. He stressed the need for dedicated organizers to make it succeed.

Southern Regional Council, Inc., awarded a $700 grant to help finance the cost of the leadership course.

Southern Consumers cooperative traces its source back to 1950 when Father Albert J. McKnight, C.S.Sp., assistant at Our Lady of Lourdes, Abbeville, organized a credit union in the mission parish in Kaplan.

Once established, Father began to reach out for other ways of making an impact on raising the economic level of the Negro. It had been proved that "little business" was not the answer. "Big business" had to be the goal, with many people pooling their resources.

Thus, in 1961, through ideas from an already existing Investment club and study courses in the Antigonish (Nova Scotia) cooperative movement, Father McKnight began plans for forming some kind of cooperative business. In September, 1961, the first meeting of the Southern Consumers cooperative was held to lay the groundwork for this cooperative effort.

Executive, educational, membership and by-laws committees were formed. A monthly congressional meeting was formulated to keep members informed so that each could take active part in the work of the co-op.

In the following months, the co-op took on a more definitive shape. Leaders came forward; the cooperative spread to surrounding areas until, at present, it has expanded to 20 towns in Louisiana with 850 members.

For the past few summers, leaders in the co-op have studied cooperative principles at Coady International institute in Antigonish, Nova Scotia, as well as visiting national cooperative headquarters in the United States.

The social leadership course held at Baton Rouge was the first weekend attempt at holding local courses to enable a larger number of people to attend and benefit from national experts in the field of cooperatives and economics.

Chattanooga Daily Times
CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
D. 52,218 S. 82,245

NOV 8 1963 Bufkeller

Aide of Regional Council To Visit Vote Committee

Randolph T. Blackwell, field director for the Southern Regional Council of Atlanta, will be guest speaker at a meeting of the Metropolitan Registration Committee Wednesday night at 8 at the Henry Branch YMCA.

Blackwell is active in voter education projects for the council. He will speak on the general picture of voter registration in the South.

The Metropolitan Committee is active in a campaign to register an additional 5,000 Negroes in Chattanooga.

The Detroit News
D. 710,775 S. 913,648

NOV 8 1963 Bufkeller

Race Relations Worker Hired by Grand Rapids

GRAND RAPIDS, Nov. 8. — (AP) — Roland E. Blanding, 24, an intergroup relations research worker from Atlanta, Ga., has been hired by this city as an assistant to Human Relations Commission Director Alfred E. Cowles.

Blanding will assume his duties Dec. 2.

Blanding is a native of Sum-

The New York Times
D. 680,265 S. 1,306,418
NOV 10 1963

High-school students protesting desegregation in Birmingham, Ala.
"Many attractive and voluble youngsters are eager to proclaim white superiority."

A Southern Teen-Ager Speaks His Mind

Disturbed by the militancy of young white Southerners in resisting school integration, a Southern writer and editor interviews an 18-year-old Mississippian.

1 Southern Reg. Council

By MARGARET LONG

OXFORD, MISS.

THE harsh and hating faces of young Southerners photographed in troubled scenes of the desegregating Deep South have shocked and baffled most other Americans, among them, indeed, many rational and peaceable people in Dixie. To investigate the ideas and feelings that fire many of these boys and girls I made a mission to Mississippi, the state where segregationist sentiment is most intense. Here I found many attractive and voluble youngsters eager to proclaim white superiority, Southern culture and Negro contentment. These high-school and college boys and girls exhibited a common innocence of the Negro movement, which they believe is fomented by outsiders and Communists. (The N.A.A.C.P., the only civil-rights organization most of them know, seems to them a blend of both.) They also showed intense emotions of both affection and revulsion toward Negroes.

The sweetly mannered young people I talked to seemed most of all gripped by a poignant loyalty to the precarious present and the easy past of the white South, a fealty uncorrupted by alien facts and ideas from beyond the tight and turbulent little world of Mississippi.

From here, the common ground fell away into varying attitudes, ranging from the valiant "Never!" of one Delta boy who would "die for" segregation, to the "It's coming" of several others and the pained confusion of a 17-year-old girl who thought, "It's awful Nigras can't come to our churches."

The Confederate dedication of one 18-year-old probably best expressed the adamant segregationist mood typical of many young people of the Deep South. He was Don Barrett, a Phi Delta Theta pledge at the University of Mississippi at Oxford, who answered questions at word-tumbling length, his replies replete with nice, old-fashioned "Yes'ms" and "No'ms." His forebears came to Mississippi from Virginia and South Carolina, and his great-grandmother, he said, gave $80,000 that she had hidden away to the Confederate Army after her plantation, Newstead, was used by Grant as headquarters during the Vicksburg campaign and then was sacked and ruined.

"She turned it over, lock, stock and barrel," he said, his round, rosy face glowing and his eyes dark with love. "That's the kind of heritage I come from—and I'm proud of it."

YOUNG Barrett's more immediate heritage includes a pleasant childhood of play in backyard pecan treehouses, fishing and hunting, adoration of a beautiful mother (she was beauty queen in high school, at Millsaps College in Jackson, and at Ole Miss) and a trusting attachment to his energetic and commanding father. ("He's got more sense in a minute than I've got in three weeks. He's the wisdom I draw on.") He also exhibits the usual masculine pleasure in two little sisters and pride tinged perhaps with rivalry, in an older brother, Pat Jr., who is taking psychology at Millsaps and planning to study law at Ole Miss.

"Yes, of course, I used to play with Negro children," he said. "We quit, well, we quit when . . . when we both realized the difference, and they went their way and I went mine. You may be surprised that our next-door neighbors were Nigras. They lived catty-corner across the street from us . . . the nearest neighbors."

Mr. Barrett spoke ardently of the good Negroes and his affection for them and their (Continued on Page 114)

MARGARET LONG is a novelist ("Louisville Saturday") and former columnist for The Atlanta Journal who two years ago received the Florina Lasker Civil Liberties Award. She is at present the editor of the Southern Regional Council's magazine New South, in Atlanta.

A Southern Teen-Ager

(Continued from Page 15)

profound loyalty to him and his. He smiled quickly and radiantly at the memory of these ancient felicities. Dora, who cooks and cleans up, is "a young 43"—like his mother. They were born on the same day and exchange birthday presents. Allie Mae, a registered nurse by correspondence course, "respected by the white community and venerated by the Negro community," nursed Don when he was born and promised his grandmother "she'd always take care of Sara," his mother. Allie Mae visits frequently in Miss Sara's bedroom and on the phone. Amelia, older, cooks on Sunday, and Pecolia, he confided with a flash of delight, "is making me a quilt." There are several Negro hands on his father's cattle farms who are also life-long familiars at the Barrett house in Lexington.

LEXINGTON is the seat of Holmes County, seven miles in the hills at the edge of the Delta, "the heart of Mississippi and the citadel of Southern rights," with "stark nekkid bluffs looking out to the Mississippi River." It is to him the most beautiful place in the world, a rich center of farming which produces the best crops and "the best people, too." The citadel of Holmes County has 19,600 Negro citizens and 7,000 whites.

"I feel, as do most of the white population of the South, that the Negro is inherently unequal," Barrett said. "Now they say it's lack of opportunity, cause and result, the reason men first took the fire and light of learning, that the Nigras never had the need in Africa because they could just pluck the fruit of the woods and all, and sustain life on that. But you can't say they didn't get learning and civilization because of the easy climate, because they've got a range of all climates and mountains and jungles. They came into contact with the Saracens in North Africa. And Alexander the Great and they never did catch the light of learning, nobody in the region. If they hadn't been taken over by the white man . . .

"Well, where they're not, they're still eating each other," he said, his voice vibrant with triumph and disgust.

"BUT the white South has taken the Neegra, fed, clothed, taught them how to speak and wear clothes and taught him Christianity. Still, look at 'em, their illegitimacy rate!"

Mr. Barrett was at such polite pains to say the respectful Southern "Nigra" and never to lapse into the easy and offensive "nigger," and I was so vigilant with my proper and hard-learned "Negro," that we quite rattled one another. Once, in the heat of exchange, he said "Neegra" and, again, "Neeger," and I once wildly pronounced it "Nigroo," to our mutual dismay. But we both behaved well upon these lapses, quite as if they had not occurred, and proceeded as nice as you please.

"In my opinion," he said, "the South made its biggest mistake—because they hated to do it out of our love and affection for the Nigras—but our mistake is in talking states' rights instead of anthropology."

"THE moderates" (and here Barrett used the term as it is widely understood in Mississippi, as equivalent to Communists or other enemies of order and freedom), "prophets of gloom and doom, say it's coming—we gotta accept it. I think if the Nigra is able to live on an equal footing after the troops leave, then we are wrong—wrong when we say the Nigra is not capable.

"Yes'm, I expect there'll have to be an occupation before there'll be integration in Mississippi, and the Kennedy twins are ruthless enough to do it without batting an eye if they're re-elected. It would probably be the most tragic thing that could happen to our beloved state. But afterward, when the troops leave . . ." Here he explained that white resistance to the troops would be so adamant that upon their despairing withdrawal, "everything would be just like before, only the poor Nigras would lose all the friendship and goodwill they had."

Barrett's uncle is a cotton planter and head of the Citizens' Council in Lexington and his father is a founder. Don himself is "a sort of honorary member" because he "wanted to give my $5," though he is under the usually accepted age. Contemplating the possibility of Negro political control in the Delta through its 65 to 70 per cent Negro majority—"although it would never happen" — Barrett said such a regime "without white man's control would be chaos."

"If we turned politics over to them, we'd have another Congo. It's not wild like that under the patient, restraining hand of the white man, when they behave reasonably well.

"Do anything to us? I don't think so, no'm. I don't believe the Nigras, if they got control, would have any reason to hurt people who have nurtured and cared for them, but it would be chaos. Yes, out of their incompetence. The economy would collapse, and it would be like Reconstruction. You remember the Nigras in power in Reconstruction were voting themselves carriages and all kind of luxuries. It wouldn't be out of malice—they're a kindly people—but out of inability to run things. The Southern code of hospitality, gentleness, kindness—they've learned it and accepted it. . . .

"IF the majority of Nigras with the vote there"—this was in reference to Charles City County, Va.—"haven't taken over, it's because they haven't got the initiative. But look at Memphis. Nigras are 32 per cent of the electorate. They're beginning to control politics, and Memphis is beginning to look like a dirty Northern city," he said in another spurt of disgust.

Barrett is also apprehensive about treatment of white women under black domination. "If the social system is thrown out of kilter, as moderates would do, there would be more danger than there is now under the patient hand of white leadership. I would certainly take up arms to protect our women. To me there is nothing more wonderful than a Southern lady. Gosh! It's really undefinable. But she's cultured, genteel, intelligent, beautiful — usually beautiful, anyway."

PATROL—Military police on duty on the University of Mississippi campus during the racial tension there a year ago.

In defense of the social and economic system, Barrett would not eat with a Negro, or call one Mr. or Mrs. or Miss, because "it's not socially acceptable, it's not done—anymore than I'd cut more than one piece of steak at a time or tuck my napkin under my chin."

NOR would he betray his manners for distinguished Negroes or for different customs in other places. In Milwaukee, where he visited an aunt and "a wonderful Yankee uncle—the only good Yankee I know," he did not desist from giving his bus seat to standing ladies, in the Mississippi way, just because it was not the usual practice in Wisconsin.

As for celebrated and accomplished Negroes, Barrett says, "more power to 'em." He cited "Gaston in Birmingham"—a millionaire Negro banker and property owner. "You can see he obviously has a very high I. Q., is well-mannered and a fine man, I'm sure. Well, it's just a combination of genes that worked out that way. But the chances are 1 in 5,000 that his children would be like that."

There are "exceptional" Negroes in Lexington, who own stores, cafes and funeral businesses, but no professionals. "We are courteous and treat them with the respect due their education," he explained. "There's none of this pushing around or 'Get outa my way' for them in stores or anywhere —or for the lowest field hand either."

Barrett scoffs at the outsiders' notion that it's deprivation and "brutality" which makes Negroes migrate from the South.

"That's ridiculous. It's economic. The Negro definitely was necessary to farming 20 years ago. My uncle owns a plantation where he had 60 families chopping cotton, borrowing money, depending on him — you know, old-style sharecropping. Ten of the 15 left live there now because they love my uncle and they depend on him, although he just needs five of 'em. But he gives them Saturday-night spending money and everything and he could say, 'Fred, go up the hill and kill me a big snake,' or 'Go cut off your head,' and Fred would do it.

"They don't help him. They're an economic liability. He supports 10 families out of love and loyalty. He's a fine fellow, president of the Tchula Citizens' Council. The others left because they had to sell their small farms—with mechanization, the Nigras can't make a profit on a little farm —and had no place to live. Now you just see old grandfathers and little bitty children, pickaninnies. The young ones have gone to Chicago.

"My girl, I talked to her on the phone and this horrible thing had happened. Houston was dead. Houston drove their tractor and she just loved him. Mr. Foose's father —that's his name, Mary's father, Mr. Foose—and Houston's father were always on the place together. Houston's father had worked for Mr. Foose's father all that time, and they loved him.

"THE Citizens' Council, Mr. Foose is a leader in it, is not like the Ku Klux Klan. We hate violence. But we are determined to keep our way of life," he declared with rapidly rising fervor. "Nobody can take it away from us, and I would die for it. I wouldn't do anything foolish, but we will not give up.

"People say Nigras are catching up—that's wonderful —but that's no justification for social change in 1963 for what might happen in 500 or 1,000 years."

Barrett is not much disturbed by the current Mississippi Negro drive to write in

(Continued on Following Page)

(Continued from Preceding Page)

15,000 or 20,000 Negro protest votes for Aaron Henry, state N.A.A.C.P. president, for governor, and the Rev. Ed King, a young, white civil-rights devotee, for lieutenant-governor, and to draw 200,000 disfranchised Negro votes in a straw election for Henry. Nor does he share outside dismay at intimidation of Negro voting aspirants — random violence, arrests of demonstrators, eviction of would-be voters from jobs and property, and a few killings.

"FEDERAL right to vote? No, the Constitution gives the states the right to say who shall vote and who shall not. There's no such thing as the right to vote. It's a privilege, earned only after qualifications set up by the state have been met. Instead of reducing voting requirements, we ought to make them more strict. I believe in the poll tax. Our $2 poll tax goes straight to the schools, white and colored.

"I don't think there's any harm in a few qualified Negroes voting. But you can't open the floodgates. I don't condone violence, but the state has the right of police power to protect the health, morals and general welfare of the people. And when feelings are running high and the spark is there, they could set off a riot.

"I think the police were right in Greenwood and Jackson [scenes of summer disorders and mass arrests of Negroes seeking the vote and other civil rights]. And about these peaceful grievances, they should not trespass on private property."

BARRETT went—"defending my state; no, not that, either, as an observer"—to the University of Mississippi upon the entrance of James Meredith to the university. He drove to Oxford with a friend, without his father's permission.

"I was close enough to the marshals to see what was happening," he related. "Some of the boys were armed, and one man was standing by the Y Building shooting out street lights with a .22 rifle. The students were jeering and sneering and occasionally tossing a cigarette butt at the marshals. All of a sudden, McShane [Chief U. S. Marshal James Joseph McShane] said, 'Gas 'em!' and from a clear blue sky, a patrolman got hit in the head, from behind, and knocked down by a marshal throwing tear gas—that metal case hit him.

"Barnett [Gov. Ross Barnett] made a mistake. That Sunday, if he'd issued a call to white males of Mississippi to stand firm at the gate, why, you'd have seen 600,000 men mustered at the gate. I know all of Holmes County would have come, except a couple of scalawags.

"I didn't attack the marshals, and I was not armed, it was not my place to. But if Governor Barnett had called the Citizens' Councils and other responsible citizens, and had said, 'Come, it is Armageddon, get your gun'—well, I certainly would. Yes, ma'am!

"Oxford seemed to me a nightmare. I felt I was not in the United States, but in Budapest or a Warsaw ghetto. If that was American action, then God save us."

If whites and Negroes attend schools together, he wonders "what's to keep little white Mary from bringing home little black Johnny from school some day, and that leads to mixed dating and mixed marriages."

Would either of his sisters grow up to choose a Negro husband? "Heavenly days, no! But girls who haven't had the upbringing would if we change the social order."

He considers Cleve McDowell, the Negro recently expelled from the University of Mississippi for carrying a gun, as "more dangerous than Meredith. The way he behaved, like I've heard people say, 'he's a good Nigra, he just wants an education.' And that would lead to acceptance. He behaved like a nigger, he would open doors, he had good manners and he scuffed his feet and held his head down. So, he could be the leak in the dike, and then the dams burst.

"Of course, Meredith was the most segregated Nigra in the United States. He was ignored. Yes." (He laughed in appreciation of the placard rhymes which appeared on the campus: "Ignore the Nigger with Vigor" and "Nigger-free in '63.") "Ole Miss has never really been integrated."

BARRETT was "not much impressed" by the Negro March on Washington. "It wasn't any different from what I see Saturday night in Lexington when they come to town to get drunk and cut up, except they're happier in Lexington." He smiled here at the remembered spectacle of Lexington police warning the tipsy Fred, "Now, Fred, how many times I got to tell you?" and at Fred's shuffling, laughing promise to stay sober.

He described Negro pleasure in Government "'mo[illegible] the surplus foods t[illegible]ey get on welfare—and [illegible] willingness of "many, many, many" simply to collect relief and "'modities" rather than work. All the Negroes on the Barrett place "get real butter and cheese" from the welfare, and "we use oleo."

Barrett, a 96-average student in high school and on a scholarship at Ole Miss, would vote for Governor Barnett, "the most courageous leader of our time," for "dictator or anything." He is now more proud of being a Mississippian than an American, and laments our "Federal power, a crushing force, a rampage," under which we're "no longer the land of the free." He also deplores foreign policy which, with the United Nations, "is destroying the only pro-West governments in Africa. Katanga and the Union of South Africa, we stab them in the back."

He takes a grisly view of Federal aid to states and localities. His story is "not original," but he compares Federal aid to the starving hunter who whacked off part of his famished dog's tail, ate off the meat, and threw the bone to the beast. Whereupon the "whimpering dog," like recipients of Federal aid, gratefully "licked the hunter's hand."

SPOKESMAN—Don Barrett in his room at home in Lexington, Miss.

FOR all his lordly and loving attachment to Negro friends, Barrett sees an eventual solution in the departure of all Negroes for the North "to live on welfare," since the planters and automated land no longer need them. He also believes the Delta will be "forever agrarian," though partly industrialized with small, imported industries employing whites in a prosperous blend of his beloved old way of life and new Yankee paychecks.

This, then, is the romantic tradition and reactionary passion with which the young segregationists of a dwindling old South face the nonviolent Negro revolution. In love with the life long gone, they stand embattled, fighting change with talk of old times, planter-rulers and good servants happy in subjection.

ATLANTA, GA.
METROPOLITAN HERALD
W. 5,021

NOV 13 1963

FORMER ATLANTANS INVOLVED

Republican Congressman Charges Interracial Organization Set Up To Get Defense Dept. Contracts

A Republican Congressman from Michigan has charged that a civil rights research group, whose executive vice president is a former Atlanta integration leader, seems to have been set up to cash in on President Kennedy's antidiscrimination drive and five weeks after its formation was awarded a $106,000 contract from the Defense Department.

The Congressman, A. E. Johansen, R-Mich., made the charge before a House subcommittee inquiring into "reverse" racial discrimination.

The organization under scrutiny is the Potomic Institute whose executive vice president is Harold C. Fleming, former director of the interracial Southern Regional Council. Mr. Fleming resigned the post to go to Washington as the active executive of the Patomic Institute when it was formed.

According to testimony given before the sub-committee, Mr. Fleming's organization was recommended to the Defense Department by Philip Hammer, an economics consultant. Mr. Hammer is well known here in Atlanta as the father of the "Plan of Improvement." He came to Atlanta from Washington in the mid-1940's and resided here until last year when he returned to Washington.

Representative Albert W. Watson, of South Carolina, charged that the Potomic Institute was "a paper corporation" with no staff, except Mr. Fleming when is received its first contract from the Defense Department.

He charged that the institute obtained the contract because of Mr. Fleming's friendship with Mr. Hammer.

Earlier testimony revealtd that Mr. Hammer had been hired as a consultant on a daily basis by the Defense Department in the Spring of 1961 when racial employment problems came up at Lockheed with 32 complaints receied.
ceived.

In his charge against the Potomic Institute, the Michigan Congressman said that it (the organization) was set up about fie weeks before it was rtcommended for the $106,000 job. He said it appeared that Potomic officials might have known that a field was opening up for race relations work for the federal government and that the insititute looked to hime like "a product of planned parenthood."

The institute has had three contracts. Two related to recommendations for implementing the equal employment program among defense contractors in private industry. The third concerned ending job bias within the Defense Department.

The Potomic Institute, according to public records, was set up as a nonprofit organization working "to eliminate discrimination and to advance equal opportunity for all Americans."

The Southern Regional Council, which Fleming headed for a number of years, has long been a controersial organization for its race-mixing policies. It has largely been supported by grants from the Fund of the Republic, a Ford Foundation offshoot. The SRC staff is recognized as containing a number of ultra-liberals. Its work has been highly praised by many interracial groups.

THE MIAMI NEWS
MIAMI, FLA.
D. 154,397 S. 137,140
NOV 15 1963

ASHMORE

'RACIAL' - - ASHMORE

Our No. 1 Problem

BAGGS

By LOUISE BLANCHARD
Reporter of The Miami News

The problem of race relations is not a separate one but "wrapped up in everything else," Harry S. Ashmore, former executive editor of the Arkansas Gazette, said here today.

"We can't decide the problems of urban renewal 'til we solve those of race," Ashmore told members of the Adult Education Association at the closing session of its convention at the Deauville Hotel.

Other panelists on civil rights were William C. Baggs, editor of The Miami News; Harold C. Fleming, executive vice president of the Potomac Institute and former director of the Southern Regional Council, and chairman John A. Griffin, of Florida State University.

"We can't solve the problems of race 'til we solve those of unemployment," Ashmore said. "And we can't solve those of unemployment 'til we deal with the problems of automation and the computer."

Baggs said the racial crisis has changed in the last 15 years and that the most important aspect of the change is the recognition that the South "does not have a franchise on racial discrimination — it's a national product."

The Washington Post
WASHINGTON, D.C.
D. 408,701 S. 491,212
NOV 15 1963

600 Atlanta Women Write Off Prejudice

MORE THAN 600 Atlanta area women have united under the banner of Women for Progress to support the Atlanta Chamber of Commerce's efforts to open that city's commercial facilities to all citizens.

A scroll signed by the women, who are leaders in more than 100 civic and religious organizations, was presented to the Chamber's board of directors Wednesday by Mrs. Edward M. Vinson, former president of the Georgia League of Women Voters.

Women for Progress was organized this fall, Mrs. Vinson told the board, "as a coordinating effort by leaders of key community women's organizations who feel that Atlanta's hard-won reputation for progress in race relations may be threatened unless all segments of the community respond to (your) appeal for all businesses to serve the public without regard to race, creed or color."

Among the organizers of Women for Progress were five women who attended the July 9 conference of 300 women leaders which President Kennedy called to ask for cooperation in furthering the civil rights movement.

Mrs. Vinson said Women for Progress "pledge our economic support to those businessmen who make their goods and services available to everyone."

Scroll signers included members of several church groups, the YMCA, the Girl Scouts, the Atlanta University Women's Clubs, the alumnae clubs of Wellesley and Smith colleges, the Atlanta Association for the United Nations, Southern Regional Council, AFL-CIO and the Atlanta School Board.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
CLARION HERALD
W. - CIRC.N.AVAIL.

NOV 21 1963

Constant advance is favored

Essays in Our Day

By DONALD McDONALD

Although President Kennedy's proposed civil rights legislation seems to be permanently stalled at this session of Congress, there is much that the executive branch of government can do to continue to improve the social and economic condition of the American Negro.

An excellent analysis of the opportunities for executive action is contained in a report published about a year ago by the Southern Regional council of Atlanta, entitled "Executive Support of Civil Rights."

The Southern Regional council is totally committed to the goal of equal opportunity for all American citizens. But it goes about its fact-finding, fact-analyzing work in a calm, objective way. Its recommendations and criticisms are invariably hard-headed and realistic. It fully realizes that instant integration is impossible, whether such is offered as a counsel or a "program."

But the council also feels that there is a great deal more that can be done to speed the day when racism will be only a fading memory in American life.

ALTHOUGH praising Mr. Kennedy for the vigor and initiative of his executive action in behalf of civil rights the first year and half of his administration, the council finds "latent weaknesses."

On the positive side, the council says that the "numerous executive decisions" made by the Kennedy administration "represent a development of importance comparable to that of the Supreme Court's school decision of 1954 . . ."

The administration "has built momentum for civil rights into the structure and the policies of the government," says the council, "and if it has not acted with more determination than public opinion requires, it has acted with more originality."

Since the council's statement, the administration has, of course, acted with considerable determination in the Alabama university case as well as in the introduction of the present civil rights bill, so much so that public opinion apparently has recoiled a bit.

But, aside from legislative action, there are, "under statutory authority," says the council, "spacious opportunities for creative executive policies."

THE COUNCIL reviews some of the special advantages of executive action: it is immediate; it can be pinpointed to meet particular circumstances; it tends to be accepted more readily by citizens because they are accustomed to the executive branches of government much more than with the legislative or judicial.

Here are some of the "areas of little action" by the federal government, according to the council:

Federal aid to research; the Hill-Burton hospital projects; the National Guard; housing.

Though the federal government has begun to move on housing, apparently it has done little or nothing to discourage segregation in hospitals built with federal money, in the National Guard substantially supported with federal funds, or in universities which depend in large part on the federal government for their research money.

The President has said that "federal money should not be spent in any way which encourages discrimination." But a segregated Southern school, such as Emory university, had, at the time of the council's report, research grants and contracts totaling $3.25 million, of which $2.5 million came from the federal government.

HOSPITALS built with Hill-Burton federal money continue to discriminate and segregate, and the National Guard in 11 Southern States is all-White.

The Southern Regional council recognizes, though it does not condone, the fact that a department or agency in Washington, say Defense, or Health, Education and Welfare, or any other, when it is "sponsoring controversial legislation in a non-civil rights area, "may be irresistibly tempted to court marginal Congressional votes by leaving civil rights alone."

But this again forces one to look to the President to seize those "spacious opportunities for creative executive policies."

AT THE TIME that Mr. Kennedy took office, the council made some carefully reasoned proposals concerning the use of both the office and the powers of the Presidency in the interest of interracial justice. The history of Mr. Kennedy's first three years in office reveals that he has, in fact, accomplished a great deal, much of it "forc'd by the occasion," it is true, but much also of the President's own initiative.

Now, when all are predicting campaign trouble for Mr. Kennedy in 1964 because of his forthright civil rights position, he will be tempted to "ease up" on federal executive actions. But the rights of Negroes are too important to be shelved even for a year. The administration must continue to move steadily and purposefully ahead.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
REVIEW
W. 118,294 (C)

NOV 22 1963

Donald

M'Donald

Although President Kennedy's proposed civil rights legislation seems to be permanently stalled at this session of Congress, there is much that the executive branch of government can do to continue to improve the social and economic condition of the American Negro.

An excellent analysis of the opportunities for executive action is contained in a report published about a year ago by the Southern Regional Council of Atlanta, entitled "Executive Support of Civil Rights."

While praising Mr. Kennedy for the vigor and initiative of his executive action in behalf of civil rights the first year and half of his administration, the council finds "latent weaknesses."

On the positive side, the council says that the "numerous executive decisions" made by the Kennedy Administration "represent a development of importance comparable to that of the Supreme Court's schools decision of 1954. . . ."

The administration "has built momentum for civil rights into the structure and the policies of the government," says the council, "and if it has not acted with more determination than public opinion requires, it has acted with more originality."

Since the council's statement, the administration has, of course, acted with considerable determination in the Alabama university case as well as in the introduction of the present civil rights bill, so much so that public opinion apparently has recoiled a bit.

But, aside from legislative action, there are, "under statutory authority," says the council, "spacious opportunities for creative executive policies."

The council reviews some of the special advantages of executive action: it is immediate; it can be pinpointed to meet particular circumstances; it tends to be accepted more readily by citizens because they are accustomed to the executive branches of government much more than with the legislative or judicial.

Here are some of the "areas of little action" by the federal government, according to the council:

Federal aid to research; the Hill-Burton hospital projects; the National Guard; housing.

While the federal government has begun to move on housing, apparently it has done little or nothing to discourage segregation in hospitals built with federal money, in the National Guard substantially supported with federal funds, or in universities which depend in large part on the federal government for their research money.

The President has said that "federal money should not be spent in any way which encourages discrimination." But a segregated southern school, such as Emory University, had, at the time of the council's report, research grants and contracts totaling $3.25 million, of which $2.5 came from the federal government.

Hospitals built with Hill-Burton federal money continue to discriminate and segregate, and the National Guard in 11 southern states is all-white.

At the time that Mr. Kennedy took office, the council made some carefully reasoned proposals concerning the use of both the office and the powers of the Presidency in the interest of interracial justice. The history of Mr. Kennedy's first three years in office reveals that he has, in fact, accomplished a great deal, much of it "forced by the occasion," it is true, but much also of the President's own initiative.

Now, when all are predicting campaign trouble for Mr. Kennedy in 1964 because of his forthright civil rights position, he will be tempted to "ease up" on federal executive actions. But the rights of Negroes are too important to be shelved even for a year. The administration must continue to move steadily and purposefully ahead.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
CATHOLIC HERALD CITIZEN
W. 168,172
NOV 23 1963

Essays in our day

By Donald McDonald

Southern Group Praises, Criticizes JFK on Civil Rights

Although President Kennedy's proposed civil rights legislation seems to be permanently stalled at this session of Congress, there is much that the executive branch of government can do to continue to improve the social and economic condition of the American Negro.

An excellent analysis of the opportunities for executive action is contained in a report published about a year ago by the Southern Regional Council of Atlanta, entitled "Executive Support of Civil Rights."

The Souhern Regional Council is totally committed to the goal of equal opportunity for all American citizens. But it goes about its fact-finding, fact-analyzing work in a calm, objective way. Its recommendations and criticisms are invariably hard-headed and realistic. It fully realizes that instant integration is impossible, whether such is offered as a counsel or a "program."

* * *

BUT THE council also feels that there is a great deal more that can be done to speed the day when racism will be only a fading memory in American life.

While praising Mr. Kennedy for the vigor and initiative of his executive action in behalf of civil rights the first year and a half of his administration, the council finds "latent weaknesses."

On the positive side, the council says that the "numerous executive decisions" made by the Kennedy Administration "represent a development of importance comparable to that of the Supreme Court's schools decision of 1954 . . ."

The administration "has built momentum for civil rights into the structure and the policies of the government," says the council, "and if it has not acted with more determination than public opinion requires, it has acted with more originaliy."

* * *

SINCE THE council's statement, the administration has, of course, acted with considerable determination in the Alabama university case as well as in the introduction of the present civil rights bill, so much so that public opinion apparently has recoiled a bit.

But, aside from legislative action, there are, "under statutory authority," says the council, "spacious opportunities for creative executive policies."

The council reviews some of the special advantages of executive action: it is immediate; it can be pinpointed to meet particular circumstances; it tends to be accepted more readily by citizens because they are accustomed to the executive branches of government much more than with the legislative or judicial.

Here are some of the "areas of little action" by the federal government, according to the council:

* * *

FEDERAL AID to research; the Hill-Burton hospital projects; the Naional Guard; housing.

While the federal government has begun to move on housing, apparently it has done little or nothing to discourage segregation in hospitals built with federal money, in the National Guard substantially supported with federal funds, or in universities which depend in large part on the federal government for their research money.

The President has said that "federal money should not be spent in any way which encourages discrimination." But a segregated souhern school, such as Emory university, had, at the time of the council's report, research grants and contracts totaling $3.25 million, of which $2.5 came from the federal government.

Hospitals built with Hill-Burton federal money continue to discriminate and segregate, and the National Guard in 11 southern States is all-white.

* * *

THE SOUTHERN Regional Council recognizes, though it does not condone, the fact that a department or agency in Washington, say Defense, or Health, Education and Welfare, or any other, when it is "sponsoring controversial legislation" in a non-civil rights area, "may be irresistibly tempted to court marginal Congressional votes by leaving civil rights alone."

But this again forces one to look to the President to seize those "spacious opportunities for creative executive policies."

At the time that Mr. Kennedy took office, the council made some carefully reasoned proposals concerning the use of both the office and the powers of the Presidency in the interest of interracial justice. The history of Mr. Kennedy's first three years in office reveals that he has, in fact, accomplished a great deal, much of it "forced by the occasion," it is true, but much also of the President's own initiative.

Now, when all are predicting campaign trouble for Mr. Kennedy in 1964 because of his forthright civil rights position, he will be tempted to "ease up" on federal executive actions. But the rights of Negroes are too important to be shelved even for a year. The administration must continue to move steadily and purposefully ahead.

The New York Times
D. 680,265 S. 1,306,418
NOV 24 1963

NEGRO GAIN SLOW IN WINNING VOTE

Registration Is Up in South, but Stands at 12%

ATLANTA, Nov. 30 (AP) — More than half a million Negroes have registered as voters in 11 southern states during the last five years. But this increase of 43 per cent has brought scant improvement in the ratio of Negro to white voters.

A survey shows approximately 1.7 million Negroes among the 14 million voters in this 11-state region. There were 1.2 million Negro voters in the South in 1958.

Comprising a fifth of the region's population, Negroes represent a potentially powerful force in politics. Their leaders have been bearing down on voter registration in recent years.

Percentage Is Up

The percentage of Negroes among the total number of registered voters moved up to 12 per cent from 10 in the five-year period.

These are the estimates:

In 1958—White voters 10,329,-120; Negro 1,172,369.

In 1963—White voters 12,285,-779; Negro 1,677,706.

These figures represent registration in Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

While complete official data are not available for each state, the Associated Press gathered estimates from state officials, Negro leaders, records where available and the Southern Regional Council, which makes a continuing study of Negro registration.

Negro voting now is concentrating in urban areas and reflects steps toward desegregation and more liberal political attitudes on racial issues in many cities.

The 12 per cent of Negroes among total registered voters may well become decisive in some states in the Presidential election if the white vote splits evenly. The Negro vote apparently swung South Carolina to John F. Kennedy in 1960, for example.

Rural Areas

attitudes on racial issues in many cities.

The 12 per cent of Negroes among total registered voters may well become decisive in some states in the Presidential election if the white vote splits evenly. The Negro vote apparently swung South Carolina to John F. Kennedy in 1960, for example.

Rural Areas

The rural areas of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana and Georgia remain the toughest hurdles in the Negro drive for voting rights.

The widest disparity in Negro population and voting is found in Mississippi, where Negroes comprise 42 per cent of the population and 5.3 per cent of the voters.

In Alabama, 30 per cent of the population is Negro and 8 per cent of the voters are Negro.

Only Texas has a larger percentage of Negro voters (14.9) than Negro residents (12 per cent). Of all the 11 states, Tennessee's figures are most nearly proportionate. Its population is 16 per cent Negro; its voters 13.3 per cent Negro.

The disparity of greatest concern to Negro leaders is found not on the state level but in the rural areas where Negroes often outnumber white residents and have little voting strength.

In Dallas County, Ala., 55 per cent of the population is Negro, but Negroes comprise only 2.3 per cent of the voters.

East Feliciana Parish, La., has about 2,600 white voters and about 120 Negro voters. The white population is the minority.

Efforts to register more Negroes as voters have been intensified in the last three years. Mass rallies at churches, door-to-door canvassing and distribution of printed material are some of the methods used.

White Volunteers

Volunteer workers from other states, often white persons, help teach reading and writing and other qualifications. They escort Negro voter registration has voting requirements is backed by some Negro groups, including the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee.

Removal of literacy tests as voting requirements is backed b some Negro groups, including the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee.

"One man, one vote," said Worth Long, a Negro student worker for S.N.C.C. at Selma, Ala.

An example of what Negro voting power can do is provided byb Georgia's state government, which turned moderate only this year under the obvious influence of nearly 200,000 Negro voters who helped carry the election for Gov. Carl E. Sanders over a segregationist, Marvin Griffin.

The Negro vote, nearly 14 per cent of the electorate, could be decisive in Mr. Sanders' determined effort to keep Georgia in the Democratic ranks next year.

CUNNINGHAM & WALSH INC.
260 MADISON AVENUE
NEW YORK 16, N.Y.
MURRAY HILL 3-4900

November 27, 1963

Mr. Harold J. Gerberg
General Manager
Burrelle's Press Clipping Bureau
165 Church Street
New York, N.Y.

Dear Mr. Gerberg:

As your records will show, we contracted with you on November 1 to commence clipping services for us on behalf of our client, Johns-Manville. Shortly afterward I left on an extended business trip, from which I returned just the other day. On my desk I found such a pile of Burrelle envelopes containing J-M clippings that contrary to my usual practices, I was forced to take them home and spend the entire evening examining them and breaking them down into proper groupings as to products and divisions.

I would like to congratulate you on the efficient and effective way that you have moved into this assignment for us, and to thank you for the extra time and effort it must have required to do so.

Compared with other clipping services with which I have initiated work in the past, I am extremely pleased with your performance.

Sincerely,

Louis Kasdan

Louis Kasdan, Manager
Public Relations Department

LK/jl

The Virginian-Pilot
NORKOLK, VA.
D. 119,187

NOV 29 1963

Panel to Discuss Job Pros, Cons

NORFOLK — A panel discussion on "Employment in Norfolk: Opportunities and Obstacles" will be part of the monthly meeting of the Norfolk Human Relations Council, Tuesday at 8 p.m. in the Central YWCA.

The public is invited.

Representing the State of Virginia on the panel will be Gregory E. Shinert, director of the Virginia Equal Job Opportunities Bureau.

LOCAL MEN

Local representatives will be Robert E. McGlaughon, Civil Service officer here, and Dr. William P. Robinson, chairman of the Political Science Department at Virginia State College.

The panel will be moderated by Dr. Leland E. Peterson of the English Department at Old Dominion College.

The Norfolk Council is an affiliate of the Virginia Council of Human Relations which is, in turn, affiliated with the Southern Regional Council of Human Relations.

The Southern Council, an organization of white and Negro Southerners, aims for "the achievement of equal opportunity for all the South's people." The objective of the Norfolk Council is the improvement of economic, civic and racial conditions here through racial cooperation.

NATION
NEW YORK, N.Y.
W. 25,103

NOV 30 1963

Silver of Ole Miss

9649

One of the splendors of a democracy is that if even a measure of freedom of inquiry and expression can be kept open, the right man will say the right thing at the right time in the right accent. In Mississippi the man is James Wesley Silver, professor of history at the University, where he has taught for twenty-seven years. The White Citizens Council of the state has labeled him "Public Enemy No. 1," an honor in itself. Last year he was further honored by election to the presidency of the Southern Historical Association — the first Mississippian so designated. When his term ended two weeks ago, Silver spoke his mind. He called Mississippi a totalitarian society that cannot tolerate freedom of inquiry or "error of opinion," and which in consequence "imposes on all its people acceptance of obedience to an official orthodoxy almost identical with the pro-slavery philosophy. . . ." All its people, Silver said — and that goes to the heart of the matter. The Negro has made some gains, even in Mississippi, and will make more; but the spiritual victim is the well-intentioned white man who "no longer has freedom of choice in the realm of ideas because they must first be harmonized with the orthodoxy."

It takes courage even for a Northerner to go to a state like Mississippi, speak his mind and return, his duty done. To live in Mississippi, to teach at a school that has lost more than fifty of its best teachers in the past year, and still speak one's mind — this calls for real heroism and not only moral but physical courage. When Silver ate with James Meredith on the campus, played golf with him and invited him to his home, rumors spread around Oxford that the Citizens Council was out to "get" the traitor to his race. Thereupon Silver moved his thirteen-year-old daughter to a less exposed bedroom and sat up all night with a shotgun across his knees. The Citizens Council, if it had any thought of violence, seems to have abandoned it in this case.

At least for the present. Silver is fifty-six and has nine years to go before retirement; it is scarcely likely that he will serve out his time. He would like to. "Why should I be run out of my home?" he asks. "I've contributed as much to this state as Ross Barnett." It is the understatement of the year.

How right Silver is about the closed society was revealed in The New York Times Magazine (November 10) in an article by Margaret Long: "A Southern Teen-Ager Speaks His Mind." Miss Long, the editor of the Southern Regional Council's magazine New South, went to Oxford and spoke to the students, including an eighteen-year-old named Don Barrett. Barrett seems to have been attractive in the way of a young man of good family, i.e., of the privileged class, and he had only kindly thoughts about the good "Nigras" whom he has known. But, "I feel," he said, "as do most of the white population of the South, that the Negro is inherently unequal." He cited Africa. Where the African Negroes haven't been taken over by the whites, he said, "they're still eating each other."

For the stark ignorance and crazy rationalizations of its young people, the older citizens of the Confederacy are to blame. The Negro will take care of himself; he has already emanicipated himself spiritually and he will emancipate himself economically and socially. The longest-lasting crime of the unregenerate Confederates has been committed, not against the Negro, but against their own young. If they had hated their children, they could not have given them a more terrible preparation for the world in which they must live. Whatever happens to Professor Silver, he can console himself with the thought that he not only had no part in that miscarriage of education but did all he could to prevent it.

CURRENT
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MONTHLY—CIRC. N. AVAIL.

NOV 1963

4 The Desegregation of Southern Schools: A Psychiatric Study, Robert Coles, M.D., Southern Regional Council, 25 pages. A child psychiatrist reports on the effects of integration upon selected groups of Southern white and Negro schoolchildren.

Current Reading Service

5 Final Report on 1963 Civil Rights Legislation, American Jewish Committee, 10 pages. A summary of state and municipal enactments.

6 What Our Cities Need Most: Brains, William Carpenter, ACTION, Inc., 24 pages. A plea for voluntary support of graduate education in urban planning, renewal and development.

7 Cities and Space, Resources for the Future, 4 pages. Extracts from papers delivered at a conference on the use of urban space as a resource.

8 Science, Scientists, and Politics, Center for the study of Democratic Institutions, 16 pages. Robert M. Hutchins, Scott Buchanan, Donald N. Michael, Chalmers Sherwin, James Real and Lynn White, Jr. on the role of science executives in government service. (Current, November 1963, page 61)

ELMIRA, N. Y.
TELEGRAM
SUN. 52,500

DEC 1 1963

Pace Is Slow

Few Negroes appear in the long line of Jefferson County citizens queued up at the courthouse in Birmingham, Ala., recently to register to vote. A five-year drive to increase Negro registration in 11 Southern states has added half a million Negroes to the lists but has had little effect on the ratio of Negro to white voters.

But Many Still Unregistered

Negro Voting Gains Strength

By DON MCKEE

ATLANTA, Ga. (AP) — More than half a million Negroes have registered as voters in 11 Southern states during the past five years but this increase, representing a 43 per cent boost, has brought scant improvement in the ratio of Negro to white voters.

An Associated Press survey shows approximately 1.7 million Negroes among the 14 million voters in this 11-state region. There were an estimated 1.2 million Negro voters in the South in 1958.

Comprising one-fifth of the region's population, Negroes represent a potentially powerful force in politics. Their leaders have been bearing down on voter registration in recent years.

The percentage of Negroes among the total number of registered voters moved up from 10 to 12 per cent in the five-year period.

These are the AP estimates:

1958—White voters 10,329,120; Negro 1,172,369.

1963—White voters 12,285,779; Negro 1,677,706.

These figures represent registration in Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

While complete official data are not available for each state, the AP gathered estimates from state officials, Negro leaders, records where available and the Southern Regional Council which makes a continuing study of Negro registration.

Negro voting now is concentrating in urban areas and reflects steps toward desegregation and more liberal political attitudes on racial issues in many cities.

The 12 per cent of Negroes among total registered voters may well become decisive in some states in the presidential election if the white vote splits nearly even. The Negro vote apparently swung South Carolina to President Kennedy in 1960, for example.

The rural areas of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana and Georgia remain the toughest hurdles in the Negro drive for voting rights.

The widest disparity in Negro population and voting is found in Mississippi where Negroes comprise 42 per cent of the population and 5.3 per cent of the voters.

In Alabama, 30 per cent of the population is Negro and 8 per cent of the voters are Negro.

Only Texas has a larger percentage of Negro voters (14.9) than Negro residents (12 per cent). Of all the 11 states, Tennessee's figures are most nearly proportionate. Its population is 16 per cent Negro; its voters 13.3 per cent Negro.

In Texas, intensive "pay your poll tax" campaigns by Negro groups in recent years have resulted in the higher percentage of the Negro population quafilying as voters.

The disparity of greatest concern to Negro leaders is found not on the state level but in the rural areas where Negroes often outnumber white residents and have little voting strength.

In Dallas County, Alabama, 55 per cent of the population is Negro, but Negroes comprise only 2.3 per cent of the voters.

East Feliciana Parish, Louisiana, has about 2,600 white voters and about 120 Negro voters. The white population is the minority.

Efforts to register more Negroes as voters have been intensified in the past three years. Mass rallies at churches, door-to-door canvassing and distribution of printed material are some of the methods used.

Volunteer workers from other states, often white persons, help teach reading and writing and other qualifications. They escort Negroes to the registrar's office.

Federal action in the field of Negro voter registration has not approached the demands of Negro leaders.

Removal of literacy tests as voting requirement 1 backed by some Negro groups, including the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee.

"One man, one vote," said Worth Long, a Negro student worker for SNCC at Selma, Ala.

An example of what Negro voting power can do is provided by Georgia's state government, which turned moderate only this year under the obvious influence of nearly 200,000 Negro voters who helped carry the election for Gov. Carl E. Sanders over segregationist Marvin Griffin.

The Negro vote, nearly 14 per cent of the electorate, could be decisive in Sanders' determined effort to keep Georgia in the Democratic ranks next year.

EXPRESS and NEWS
SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS
SAT. 107,787 SUN. 111,361

DEC 1 1963

PACE IS SLOW, NEGRO-WHITE REGISTRATION RATIO GAP IS WIDE
. . . few Negroes appear in long line of Birmingham, Ala., citizens queued up at courthouse to register

Negro Drive To Add Votes Has Small Effect on Ratio

ATLANTA, Ga. (AP) — More than half a million Negroes have registered as voters in 11 Southern states during the past five years but this increase, representing a 43 per cent boost, has brought scant improvement in the ratio of Negro to white voters.

An Associated Press survey shows approximately 1.7 million Negroes among the 14 million voters in this 11-state region. There were an estimated 1.2 million Negro voters in the South in 1958.

Comprising one-fifth of the region's population, Negroes represent a potentially powerful force in politics. Their leaders have been bearing down on voter registration in recent years.

The percentage of Negroes among the total number of registered voters moved up from 10 to 12 per cent in the five-year period.

These are the AP estimates:

1958—White voters 10,329,120; Negro 1,172,369.

1963—White voters 12,285,779; Negro 1,677,706.

These figures represent registration in Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

While complete official data are not available for each state, the AP gathered estimates from state officials, Negro leaders, records where available and the Southern Regional Council which makes a continuing study of Negro registration.

Negro voting now is concentrating in urban areas and reflects steps toward desegregation and more liberal political attitudes on racial issues in many cities.

The 12 per cent of Negroes among total registered voters may well become decisive in some states in the presidential election if the white vote splits nearly even. The Negro vote apparently swung South Carolina to President Kennedy in 1960, for example.

The rural areas of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana and Georgia remain the toughest hurdles in the Negro drive for voting rights.

The widest disparity in Negro population and voting is found in Mississippi where Negroes comprise 42 per cent of the population and 5.3 per cent of the voters.

In Alabama, 30 per cent of the population is Negro and 8 per cent of the voters are Negro.

Only Texas has a larger percentage of Negro voters (14.9) than Negro residents (12 per cent). Of all the 11 states, Tennessee's figures are most nearly proportionate. Its population is 16 per cent Negro; its voters 13.3 per cent Negro.

In Texas, intensive "pay your poll tax" campaigns by Negro groups in recent years have resulted in the higher percentage of the Negro population qualifying as voters.

The disparity of greatest concern to Negro leaders is found not on the state level but in the rural areas where Negroes often outnumber white residents and have little voting strength.

In Dallas County, Alabama, 55 per cent of the population is Negro, but Negroes comprise only 2.3 per cent of the voters.

East Feliciana Parish, Louisiana, has about 2,600 white voters and about 120 Negro voters. The white population is the minority.

Efforts to register more Negroes as voters have been intensified in the past three years. can Baptist pastors in t h e state Mass rallies at churches, door-to-door canvassing and distribution of printed material are some of the methods used.

Volunteer workers from other states, often white persons, help teach reading and writing and other qualifications. They escort Negroes to the registrar's office.

Federal action in the field of Negro voter registration has not approached the demands of Negro leaders.

Removal of literacy tests as voting requirement is backed by some Negro groups, including the Student Nonviolent Cordinating Committee.

"One man, one vote," said Worth Long, a Negro student worker for SNCC at Selma, Ala.

An example of what Negro voting power can do is provided by Georgia's state government, which turned moderate only this year under the obvious influence of nearly 200,000 Negro voters who helped carry the election for Gov. Carl E. Sanders over segregationist Marvin Griffin.

The Negro vote, nearly 14 per cent of the electorate, could be decisive in Sanders' determined effort to keep Georgia in the Democratic ranks next year.

Negro Voting Record in Southern States

STATE	PER CENT NEGRO POPULATION	TOTAL VOTERS	NEGRO VOTERS	PER CENT NEGRO
Alabama	29.9	1,014,368	84,368	8
Arkansas	21.7	633,665	75,000	11.8
Florida	17	1,919,801	218,000	11.4
Georgia	28	1,402,000	192,075	13.7
Louisiana	30	1,125,614	153,655	13.7
Mississippi	42	525,000	28,000	5.3
North Carolina	24	2,090,270	217,816	10.4
South Carolina	34	700,000	100,000	14.3
Tennessee	16	1,500,000	200,000	13.3
Texas	12	2,020,183	300,000	14.9
Virginia	20	1,032,584	108,792	10.5
TOTALS	22.6	13,963,485	1,677,706	12

THE NASHVILLE TENNESSEAN
D. 129,288 S. 208,237

DEC 1 1963

STATE	PER CENT NEGRO POPULATION	TOTAL VOTERS	NEGRO VOTERS	PER CENT NEGRO
Alabama	29.9	1,014,368	84,368	8
Arkansas	21.7	633,665	75,000	11.8
Florida	17	1,919,801	218,000	11.4
Georgia	28	1,402,000	192,075	13.7
Louisiana	30	1,125,614	153,655	13.7
Mississippi	42	525,000	28,000	5.3
North Carolina	24	2,090,270	217,816	10.4
South Carolina	34	700,000	100,000	14.3
Tennessee	16	1,500,000	200,000	13.3
Texas	12	2,020,183	300,000	14.9
Virginia	20	1,032,584	108,792	10.5
TOTALS	22.6	13,963,485	1,677,706	12

—AP Newsfeatures photo

BIRMINGHAM—Few Negroes appear in the long line of Jefferson County citizens queued up at the Alabama courthouse recently to register to vote—despite the foreground copy of the famous statue. Chart inset shows how far Negroes have to go.

Negro Dixie Vote Drive Still Short of Real Gain

—AP Newsfeatures photo

BIRMINGHAM—Few Negroes appear in the long line of Jefferson County citizens queued up at the Alabama courthouse recently to register to vote—despite the foreground copy of the famous statue. Chart inset shows how far Negroes have to go.

Negro Dixie Vote Drive Still Short of Real Gain

By DON McKEE

ATLANTA — More than half a million Negroes have registered as voters in 11 Southern states during the past five years but this increase, representing a 43 per cent boost, has brought scant improvement in the ratio of Negro to white voters.

An Associated Press survey shows approximately 1.7 million Negroes among the 14 million voters in this 11-state region. There were an estimated 1.2 million Negro voters in the South in 1958.

Comprising one-fifth of the region's population, Negroes represent a potentially powerful force in politics. Their leaders have been bearing down on voter registration in recent years.

The percentage of Negroes among the total number of registered voters moved up from 10 to 12 per cent in the five-year period.

These are the AP estimates:

- 1958—white voters 10,329,-120; Negro 1,172,369.
- 1963—white voters 12,285,-779; Negro 1,677,706.

These figures represent registration in Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

Urban Concentration

While complete official data are not available for each state, the AP gathered estimates from state officials, Negro leaders, records where available and the Southern Regional Council which makes a continuing study of Negro registration.

Negro voting now is concentrating in urban areas and reflects steps toward desegregation and more liberal political attitudes on racial issues in many cities.

The 12 per cent of Negroes among total registered voters may well become decisive in some states in the Presidential election if the white vote splits nearly even. The Negro vote apparently swung South Carolina to President Kennedy in 1960, for example.

The rural areas of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana and Georgia remain the toughest hurdles in the Negro drive for voting rights.

Widest Disparity

The widest disparity in Negro population and voting is found in Mississippi where Negroes comprise 42 per cent of the population and 5.3 per cent of the voters.

In Alabama, 30 per cent of the population is Negro and 8 per cent of the voters are Negro.

Only Texas has a larger percentage of Negro voters (14.9) than Negro residents (12 per cent). Of all the 11 states, Tennessee's figures are most nearly proportionate. Its population is 16 per cent Negro; its voters 13.3 per cent Negro.

The disparity of greatest concern to Negro leaders is found not on the state level but in the rural areas where Negroes often outnumber white residents and have litle votin gstrength.

In Dallas County, Alabama, 55 per cent of the population is Negro, but Negroes comprise only 2.3 per cent of the voters.

Negro Majority

East Feliciana Parish, Louisiana, has about 2,600 white voters and about 120 Negroe voters. The white population is the minority.

Efforts to register more Negroes as voters have been intensified in the past three years. Mass rallies at churches, door-to-door canvassing and distribution of printed material are some of the methods used.

Volunteer workers from other states, often white persons, help teach reading and writing and other qualifications. They escort Negroes to the registrar's office.

Federal Action

Federal action in the field of Negro voter registration have not approached the demands of Negro leaders.

Removal of literacy tests as voting requirements is backed by some Negro groups, including the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee.

"One man, one vote," said Worth Long, a Negro student worker for SNCC at Selma, Ala.

An example of what Negro voting power can do is provided by Georgia's state government, which turned moderate only this year under the obvious influence of nearly 200,000 Negro voters who helped carry the election for Gov. Carl E. Sanders over segregationist Marvin Griffin.

The Negro vote, nearly 14 per cent of the electorate, could be decisive in Sanders' determined effort to keep Georgia in the Democratic ranks next year.

Herald American
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
SUN. 210,836

DEC 1 1963

43 Per Cent More Negroes Register to Vo

By DON MCKEE

ATLANTA, Ga. (AP) — More than half a million Negroes have registered as voters in 11 Southern states during the past five years but this increase, representing a 43 per cent boost, has brought scant improvement in the ratio of Negro to white voters.

An Associated Press survey shows approximately 1.7 million Negroes among the 14 million voters in this 11-state region. There were an estimated 1.2 million Negro voters in the South in 1958.

Comprising one-fifth of the region's population, Negroes represent a potentially powerful force in politics. Their leaders have been bearing down on voter registration in recent years.

The percentage of Negroes among the total number of registered voters moved up from 10 to 12 per cent in the five-year period.

These are the AP estimates:

1958—White voters 10,329,120; Negro 1,172,369.

1963—White voters 12,285,779; Negro 1,677,706.

These figures represent registration in Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

While complete official data are not avaiable for each state, the AP gathered estimates from state officiaisl, Negro leaders, records where available and the Southern Regional Council which makes a continuing study of Negro registration.

Negro voting now is concentrating in urban areas and reflects steps toward desegregation and more liberal political attitudes on racial issues in many cities.

The 12 per cent of Negroes among total registered voters may well become decisive in some states in the presidential election if the white vote splits nearly even. The Negro vote apparently swung South Carolina to President Kennedy in 1960, for example.

The rural areas of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana and Georgia remain the toughest hurldes in the Negro drive for voting rights.

The widest disparity in Negro population and voting is found in Mississippi where Negroes comprise 42 per cent of the population and 5.3 per cent of the voters.

In Alabama, 30 per cent of the population is Negro and 8 per cent of the voters are Negro.

Only Texas has a larger percentage of Negro voters (14.9) than Negro residents (12 per cent). Of all the 11 states, Tennessee's figures are most nearly proportionate. Its populatio is 16 per cent Negro; its voters 13.3 per cent Negro.

In Texas, intensive "pay your poll tax" campaigns by Negro groups in recent years have resulted in the higher percentage of the Negro population qualifying as voters.

The disparity of greatest concern to Negro leaders is found not on the state level but in the rural areas where Negroes often outnumber white residents and have little voting strength.

In Dallas County, Alabama, 55 per cent of the population is Negro, but Negroes comprise only 2.3 per cent of the voters.

East Feliciana Parish, Louisiana, has about 2,600 white voters and about 120 Negro voters. The white population is the minority.

Register to Vote in 11 States in Last 5 Years

ns by Negro ars have re-r percentage ation qualify-greatest con-ers is found el but in the Negroes oft-te residents and have little voting strength.

In Dallas County, Alabama, 55 per cent of the population is Negro, but Negroes comprise only 2.3 per cent of the voters.

East Feliciana Parish, Louisiana, has about 2,600 white voters and about 120 Negro voters. The white population is the minority.

Efforts to register more Negroes as voters have been intensified in the past three years. Mass rallies at churches, door-to-door canvassing and distribution of printed material are some of the methods used.

Volunteer workers from other states, often white persons, help teach reading and writing and other qualifications. They escort Negroes to the registrar's office.

Federal action the field of Negro voter registration has not approached the demands of Negro leaders.

Removal of literacy tests as voting requirement i backed by some Negro groups, including the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee.

"One man, one vote," said Worth Long, a Negro student worker for SNCC at Selma, Ala.

An example of what Negro voting power can do is provided by Georgia's state government, which turned moderate only this year under the obvious influence of nearly 200,000 Negro voters who helped carry the election for Gov. Carl E. Sanders over segregationist Marvin Griffin.

The Negro vote, nearly 14 per cent of the electorate, could be decisive in Sanders' determined effort to keep Georgia in the Democratic ranks next year.

SAVANNAH, GA.
NEWS
D. 55,202 S. 60,313
DEC 1 1963

Throughout the South

Negro Voting Lists Show Healthy Rise

ATLANTA (AP) — More than half a million Negroes have registered as voters in 11 Southern states during the past five years but this increase, representing a 43 per cent boost, has brought scant improvement in the ratio of Negro to white voters.

An Associated Press survey shows approximately 1.7 million Negroes among the 14 million voters in this 11-state region. There were an estimated 1.2 million Negro voters in the South in 1958.

Comprising one-fifth of the region's population, Negroes represent a potentially powerful force in politics. Their leaders have been bearing down on voter registration in recent years.

The percentage of Negroes among the total number of registered voters moved up from 10 to 12 per cent in the five-year period.

These are the AP estimates:

1958—White voters 1,329,120; Negro 1,172,369.

1963—White voters 12,285,779; Negro 1,677,706.

Eleven States

These figures represent registration in Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississppi, North Carolina, South Carolna, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

While complete official data are not avaiable for each state, the AP gathered estimates from state officials, Negro leaders, records where available and the Southern Regional Council which makes a continuing study of Negro registration.

Negro voting now is concentrating in urban areas and reflects steps toward desegregation and more liberal political attitudes on racial issues in many cities.

The 12 per cent of Negroes among total registered voters may well become decisive in some states in the presidential election if the white vote splits nearly even. The Negro vote apparently swung South Carolna to President Kennedy in 1960, for example.

The rural areas of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana and Georgia remain the toughest hurdles in the Negro drive for voting rights.

The widest disparity in Negro population and voting is found in Missssippi where Negroes comprise 42 per cent of the population and 5.3 per cent of the voters.

In Alabama, 30 per cent of the population is Negro and 8 per cent of the voters are Negro.

Only Texas Larger

Only Texas has a larger percentage of Negro voters (14.9) than Negro residents (12 per cent). Of all the 11 states, Tennessee's figures are most nearly proportionate. Its population is 16 per cent Negro; its voters 13.3 per cent Negro.

The disparity of greatest concern to Negro leaders is found not on the state level but in the rural areas where Negroes often outnumber white residents and have little voting strength.

In Dallas County, Alabama, 55 per cent of the population is Negro, but Negroes comprise only 2.3 per cent of the voters.

East Feliciana Parish, Louisiana, has about 2,600 white voters and about 120 Negro voters. The white population is the minority.

Efforts to register more Negroes as voters have been intensified in the past three years. Mass rallies at churches, door-to-door canvassing and distribution of printed material are some of the methods used.

Volunteer workers from other states, often white persons, help teach reading and writing and other qualifications. They escort Negroes to the registrar's office.

Federal action in the field of Negro voter registration has not approached the demands of Negro leaders.

Removal of literacy tests as voting requirement is backed by some Negro groups, including the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee.

"One man, one vote," said Worth Long, a Negro student worker for SNCC at Selma, Ala.

An example of what Negro voting power can do is provided by Georgia's state government, which turned moderate only this year under the obvious influence of nearly 200,000 Negro voters who helped carry the election for Gov. Carl E. Sanders over segregationist Marvin Griffin.

The Negro vote, nearly 14 per cent of the electorate, could be decisive in Sanders' determined effort to keep Georgia in the Democratic ranks next year.

ATLANTA, GA.
WORLD (N)
D. 29,800
DEC 1 1963

Dunbar Speaks At A. U. Town Hall

Dr. Leslie Dunbar, executive director of the Southern Regional Council, will participate in the Atlanta University Town Meeting panel, "The Changing Mind of the South," on Thursday, December 5, at 8:00 p. m. in Dean Sage Auditorium. His partner in the discussion will be Mr. James Forman, executive secretary of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee.

Town Meeting are sponsored by the Department of Political Science of Atlanta University and are moderated by Dr. Samuel DuBois Cook, chairman of the Department. The public is invited to attend.

Dr. Dunbar, a former Guggenheim Fellow, obtained his doctoral degree in political science from Cornell University. He taught at Mount Holyoke College and Emory University and worked for a time with the Atomic Energy Commission. Mr. Forman is a graduate of Roosevelt University and has done advanced study at Boston University. A short time ago, he received the Alumni Award from Roosevelt University. He has been active in the student movement since 1961.

RIVERSIDE, CALIF.
ENTERPRISE
D. 26,649

DEC 1 1963

Southern Negro voting ratio

By DON McKEE

ATLANTA (AP) — More than half a million Negroes have registered as voters in 11 Southern states during the past five years but this increase, representing a 43 per cent boost, has brought scant improvement in the ratio of Negro to white voters.

An Associated Press survey shows approximately 1.7 million Negroes among the 14 million voters in this 11-state region. There were an estimated 1.2 million Negro voters in the South in 1958.

Comprising one-fifth of the region's population, Negroes represent a potentially powerful force in politics. Their leaders have been bearing down on voter registration in recent years.

THE PERCENTAGE of Negroes among the total number of registered voters moved up from 10 to 12 per cent in the five-year period.

These are the AP estimates:

1958 — White voters 10,329,120; Negro 1,172,369.

1963 — White voters 12,285,779; Negro 1,677,706.

These figures represent registration in Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

WHILE complete official data are not available for each state, the AP gathered estimates from state officials, Negro leaders, records where available and the Southern Regional Council which makes a continuing study of Negro registration.

Negro voting now is concentrating in urban areas and reflects steps toward desegregation and more liberal political attitudes on racial issues in many cities.

The 12 per cent of Negroes among total registered voters may well become decisive in some states in the presidential election if the white vote splits nearly even. The Negro vote apparently swung South Carolina to President Kennedy in 1960, for example.

THE RURAL areas of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana and Georgia remain the toughest hurdles in the Negro drive for voting rights.

The widest disparity in Negro population and voting is found in Mississippi where Negroes comprise 42 per cent of the population and 5.3 per cent of the voters.

In Alabama, 30 per cent of the population is Negro and 8 per cent of the voters are Negro.

Only Texas has a larger percentage of Negro voters (14.9) than Negro residents (12 per cent). Of all the 1 states, Tennessee's figures are most nearly proportionate. Its population is 16 per cent Negro; its voters 13.3 per cent Negro.

THE DISPARITY of greatest concern to Negro leaders is found not on the state level but in the rural areas where Negroes often outnumber white residents and have little voting strength.

In Dallas County, Alabama, 55 per cent of the population is Negro, but Negroes comprise only 2.3 per cent of the voters.

East Feliciana Parish, Louisiana, has about 2,600 white voters and about 120 Negro voters. The white population is the minority.

Efforts to register more Negroes as voters have been inetnsified in the past three years. Mass rallies at churches, door - to - door canvassing and distribution of printed material are some of the methods used.

VOLUNTEER workers from other states, often white persons, help teach reading and writing and other qualifications. They escort Negroes to the registrar's office.

Federal actions in the field of Negro voter registration have not approached the demands of Negro leaders.

Removal of literacy tests as voting requirements is backed by some Negro groups, including the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee.

"One man, one vote," said Worth Long, a Negro student worker for SNCC at Selma, Ala.

AN EXAMPLE of what Negro voting power can do is provided by Georgia's state government which turned moderate only this year un-ng ratios remain under par ut in the rural areas re Negroes often outnum- white residents and have voting strength.

Dallas County, Alaba- 55 per cent of the popula- is Negro, but Negroes prise only 2.3 per cent of voters.

st Feliciana Parish, siana, has about 2,600 e voters and about 120 ro voters. The white pop- on is the minority.

forts to register more roes as voters have been sified in the past three s. Mass rallies at ches, door - to - door assing and distribution inted material are some e methods used.

LUNTEER workers from states, often white per- help teach reading and ng and other qualifica- . They escort Negroes to registrar's office.

deral actions in the field Negro voter registration not approached the de- ds of Negro leaders.

moval of literacy tests voting requirements is ed by some Negro ps, including the Student iolent Coordinating Com- ee.

ne man, one vote," said h Long, a Negro student er for SNCC at Selma,

EXAMPLE of what o voting power can do is ided by Georgia's state rnment which turned erate only this year under the obvious influence of nearly 200,000 Negro voters who helped carry the election for Gov. Carl E. Sanders over segregationist Marvin Griffin.

The Negro vote, nearly 14 per cent of the electorate, could be decisive in Sanders' determined effort to keep Georgia in the Democratic ranks next year.

(AP Newsfeatures Photo)

THE PACE IS SLOW — Few Negroes appear in the long line of Jefferson County citizens queued up at the courthouse in Birmingham, Ala., recently to register to vote. Liberty's lamp is held high, in a copy of the famous statue, but her back is turned toward the line.

The Christian Science Monitor
BOSTON, MASS.
WESTERN EDITION
D. 174,850

DEC 2 1963

Negro Vote Drives In South Assessed

By the Associated Press

Atlanta

More than half a million Negroes have registered as voters in 11 Southern states during the past five years but this increase, representing a 43 percent boost, has brought scant improvement in the ratio of Negro to white voters.

A survey shows approximately 1.7 million Negroes among the 14 million voters in this 11-state region. There were an estimated 1.2 million Negro voters in the South in 1958.

Comprising one-fifth of the region's population, Negroes represent a potentially powerful force in politics. Their leaders have been bearing down on voter registration in recent years.

The percentage of Negroes among the total number of registered voters moved up from 10 to 12 percent in the five-year period.

These are the survey's estimates:

1958—white voters 10,329,-120; Negro 1,172,369.

1963—white voters 12,285,-779; Negro 1,677,706.

States Checked

These figures represent registration in Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia.

While complete official data are not available for each state, the survey gathered estimates from state officials, Negro leaders, records where available, and the Southern Regional Council, which makes a continuing study of Nergo registration.

Negro voting now is concentrating in urban areas and reflects steps toward desegregation and more liberal political attitudes on racial issues in many cities.

Decisive Role Seen

The 12 percent of Negroes among total registered voters may well become decisive in some states in the presidential election if the white vote splits nearly evenly. The Negro vote apparently swung South Carolina to President Kennedy in 1960, for example.

The rural areas of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Georgia remain the toughest hurdles in the Negro drive for voting rights.

The widest disparity in Negro population and voting is found in Mississippi where Negroes comprise 42 percent of the population and 5.3 percent of the voters.

In Alabama, 30 percent of the population is Negro and 8 percent of the voters are Negro.

Only Texas has a larger percentage of Negro voters (14.9) than Negro residents (12 percent). Of all the 11 states, Tennessee's figures are most nearly proportionate. Its population is 16 percent Negro; its voters 13.3 percent Negro.

Campaigns Waged

In Texas, intensive "pay your poll tax" campaigns by Negro groups in recent years have resulted in the higher percentage of the Negro population qualifying as voters.

The disparity of greatest concern to Negro leaders is found not on the state level but in the rural areas where Negroes often outnumber white residents and have little voting strength.

In Dallas County, Ala., 55 percent of the population is Negro, but Negroes comprise only 2.3 percent of the voters.

HUDSON, N.Y.
REGISTER STAR
D. 8,659

DEC 3 1963

Negro Vote Rise Doesn't Aid Percentage

ATLANTA, Ga. (AP) — More han half a million Negroes ave registered as voters in 11 outhern states during the past ive years but this increase, epresenting a 43 per cent boost, as brought scant improvement n the ratio of Negro to white oters.

An Associated Press survey hows approximately 1.7 million Negroes among the 14 million oters in this 11-state region. There were an estimated 1.2 million Negro voters in the South in 1958.

Comprising one-fifth of the region's population, Negroes represent a potentially powerful orce in politics. Their leaders ave been bearing down on voter registration in recent years.

The percentage of Negroes among the total number of registered voters moved up from 0 to 12 per cent in the five-year eriod.

These are the AP estimates:

1958—White voters 10,329,120; Negro 1,172,369.

1963—White voters 12,285,779; Negro 1,677,706.

These figures represent registration in Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

While complete official data are not avaiable for each state, the AP gathered estimates from state officials, Negro leaders, records where available and the Southern Regional Council which makes a continuing study of Negro registration.

Negro voting now is concentrating in urban areas and reflects steps toward desegregation and more liberal political attitudes on racial issues in many cities.

The 12 per cent of Negroes among total registered voters may well become decisive in some states in the presidential election if the white vote splits nearly even. The Negro vote apparently swung South Carolina to President Kennedy in 1960, for example.

The rural areas of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana and Georgia remain the toughest

While complete official data are not available for each state, the AP gathered estimates from state officials, Negro leaders, records where available and the Southern Regional Council which makes a continuing study of Negro registration.

Negro voting now is concentrating in urban areas and reflects steps toward desegregation and more liberal political attitudes on racial issues in many cities.

The 12 per cent of Negroes among total registered voters may well become decisive in some states in the presidential election if the white vote splits nearly even. The Negro vote apparently swung South Carolina to President Kennedy in 1960, for example.

The rural areas of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana and Georgia remain the toughest hurldes in the Negro drive for voting rights.

The widest disparity in Negro population and voting is found in Mississippi where Negroes comprise 42 per cent of the population and 5.3 per cent of the voters.

In Alabama, 30 per cent of the population is Negro and 8 per cent of the voters are Negro.

Only Texas has a larger percentage of Negro voters (14.9) than Negro residents (12 per cent). Of all the 11 states, Tennessee's figures are most nearly proportionate. Its population is 16 per cent Negro; its voters 13.3 per cent Negro.

In Texas, intensive "pay your poll tax" campaigns by Negro groups in recent years have resulted in the higher percentage of the Negro population qualifying as voters.

Efforts to register more Negroes as voters have been intensified in the past three years. Mass rallies at churches, door-to-door canvassing and distribution of printed material are some of the methods used.

Volunteer workers from other states, often white persons, help teach reading and writing and other qualifications. They escort Negroes to the registrar's office.

Federal action in the field of Negro voter registration has not approached the demands of Negro leaders.

Removal of literacy tests as voting requirements is backed by some Negro groups, including the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee.

ROCKY MOUNT, N.C.
TELEGRAM
D 15,177 S. 15,240

DEC 5 1963

South's Registered Negroes Increase Slightly

By DON MCKEE

ATLANTA, Ga. (AP) — More than half a million Negroes have registered as voters in 11 Southern states during the past five years but this increase, representing a 43 per cent boost, has brought scant improvement in the ratio of Negro to white voters.

An Associated Press survey shows approximately 1.7 million Negroes among the 14 million voters in the 11-state region. There were an estimated 1.2 million Negro voters in the south in 1958. Co

Comprising one-fifth of the region's population, Negroes represent a potenially powerful force in politics. Their leaders have been bearing down on voter registration in recent years.

The percentage of Negroes among the total number of registered voters moved up from 10 to 12 per cent in the five-year period.

These are the AP estimates:

1958—White voters 10,329,120; Negro 1,'72,369.

1963—White voters 12,285,779; Negroes 1,677,706.

Eleven States Counted

These figures represent registration in Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

While complete official data are not available for each state the AP gathered estimates from state officials, Negro leaders, records where available and the Southern Regional Council which makes a continuing study of Negro registration.

Negro voting now is concentrating in urban areas and reflects steps toward desegregation and more liberal political attitudes on racial issues in many cities.

The 12 per cent of Negroes among total registered voters may well become decisive in some states in the presidential election if the white vote splits nearly even. The Negro vote apparently swung South Carolina to President Kennedy in 1960, for example.

The rural areas of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana and Georgia remain the toughest hurldes in the Negro drive for voting rights.

The widest disparity in Negro population and voting is found in Mississippi where Negroes comprise 42 per cent of the population and 5.3 per cent of the voters.

In Alabama, 30 per cent of the population is Negro and 8 per cent of the voters are Negro.

Only Texas has a larger percentage of Negro voters (14.9) than Negro residents (12 per cent). Of all the 11 states, Tennessee's figures are most nearly proportionate. Its population is 16 per cent Negro; its voters 13.3 per cent Negro.

Voting Strength Weak

The disparity of greatest concern to Negro leaders is found not on the state level but in the rural areas where Negroes often outnumber white residents and have little voting strength.

In Dallas County, Alabama, 55 per cent of the population is Negro, but Negroes comprise only 2.3 per cent of the voters.

East Feliciana Parish, Louisiana, has about 2,600 white voters and about 120 Negro voters. The white population is the minority.

Efforts to register more Negroes as voters have been intensified in the past three years. Mass rallies at churches, door-to-door canvassing and distribution of printed material are some of the methods used.

Volunteers Help

Volunteer workers from other states, often white persons, help teach reading and writing and other qualifications. They escort negroes to the registrars office.

Federal action in the field of Negro voter registration has not approached the demands of Negro leaders.

Removal of literacy tests as voting requirement is backed by some Negro groups, including the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee.

"One man, one vote," said Worth Long, a Negro student worker for SNCC at Selma, Ala.

Negroes Carry Election

An example of what Negro voting power can do is provided by Georgia's state government, which turned moderate only this year under the obvious influence of nearly 200,000 Negro voters who helped carry the election for Gov. Carl E. Sanders over segregationist Marvin Griffin.

The Negro vote, nearly 14 per cent of the electorate, could be decisive in Sanders' determined effort to keep Georgia in the Democratic ranks next year.

Few Negroes Appear To Register In Jefferson County Courthouse In Birmingham

Negro Voting In South

State	Per Cent Negro Population	Total Voters	Negro Voters	Per Cent Negro
Ala.	29.9	1,014,368	84,368	8.0
Ark.	21.7	633,665	75,000	11.8
Fla.	17.0	1,919,801	218,000	11.4
Ga.	28.0	1,402,000	192,075	13.7
La.	30.0	1,125,614	153,655	13.7
Miss.	42.0	525,000	28,000	5.3
N.C.	24.0	2,090,270	217,816	10.4
S.C.	34.0	700,000	100,000	14.3
Tenn.	16.0	1,500,000	200,000	13.3
Tex.	12.0	2,020,183	300,000	14.9
Va.	20.0	1,032,584	108,792	10.5
TOTALS	22.6	13,963,485	1,677,706	12.0

RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER
D. 120,884

DEC 6 1963

IN SESSION HERE

Human Relations Unit President Re-elected

Dr. Aubrey N. Brown Jr. of Richmond, editor of the Presbyterian Outlook, today was re-elected president of the Virginia Council on Human Relations.

The council is holding its annual meeting at the Union Theological Seminary here. Twenty-two local councils are represented in the state organization.

(Colonial Studio)
DR. AUBREY N. BROWN JR.

Also re-elected at an afternoon meeting of the board of directors were:

W. R. Walker Jr. of Hampton, first vice president; Dr. G. Gordon Moss dean of Longwood College, Farmville, Dr. E. B. Henderson of Fairfax and the Rt. Rev. William H. Marmion of Roanoke, bishop of the Episcopal Diocese of Southwestern Virginia, vice presidents; Dr. J. Rupert Picott, executive secretary of the Virginia Teachers Association, treasurer, and Dr. Harry Roberts of Petersburg, secretary.

ELECTED TO 3-YEAR TERM

Eleven persons were elected new members of the board for three-year terms. They are:

The Rev. Chester T. Ashby of White Stone, Dr. C. Clyde Carter of Fredericksburg, Dr. C. Lawson Crowe of Sweet Briar, Mrs. Isabella Fey and John H. Robertson of Norfolk, Henry Caravati and Lawrence W. Wilder of Richmond, the Rev. Curtis Harris and Dr. Sam M. Moffett of Hopewell, Robert C. Hueston of Harrisonburg and Mrs. E. A. Smythe of Blacksburg.

John A. Lapp of the Eastern Mennonite College at Harrisonburg and the Rev. Chris Rigby of Franklin were elected for two-year terms.

14 RE-ELECTED TO BOARD

Fourteen other persons were re-elected to the board.

The council members will hear two speakers at tonight's program: Paul Anthony, field director of the Southern Regional Council, Atlanta, and the Rev. L. Francis Griffin, a Farmville minister who is president of the Virginia branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

The Greensboro Record
GREENSBORO, N. C.
D. 31,743

DEC 6 1963

Headquarters Set For Voter Drive

Workers in the voter registration campaign being conducted by Greensboro branch of National Association for the Advancement of Colored People will have headquarters at 714 Gorrell St. between 2 and 6 p.m. tomorrow, Dr. George C. Simkins, president of the branch, said today.

The drive, in its third week, is being carried out under a $1,500 grant from the voter education project of the Southern Regional Council, Atlanta. Dr. Simkins said that more than 300 persons have been registered to date in the drive.

THE ATLANTA CONSTITUTION
For 95 Years the South's Standard Newspaper
D. 202,635

DEC 6 1963

'60 Sit-Ins Seen Spark To Equality

By HAL GULLIVER

The white and Negro South met each other for the first time in early 1960 when the first sit-ins began in Greensboro, N.C., Dr. Leslie Dunbar said here Thursday.

Dunbar said: "Until then the Negro Southerner had a 'place.' That was the place of inferiority. That place has been rejected, and that is the great news of our time."

Dunbar, executive director of the Southern Regional Council, spoke at the Atlanta University Town Meeting on "The Changing Mind of the South."

PART OF COMMUNITY

"Only with the beginning of the sit-in movement did it dawn on the white South that the Negro was part of the Southern community," Dunbar said.

Dunbar and James Foreman, executive secretary of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee, told Atlanta University students that increased Negro participation in politics is the only answer to many racial difficulties.

"The only hope we have of creating a bi-racial community at peace with itself is to open up the channel of politics," Dunbar said.

URGES NEW ORDER

Foreman said that this means "dislodging from power the Eastlands and Talmadges before a "new order" can take effect.

Foreman quoted an African politician who argued, "Seek ye first the political kingdom, and all else will be added unto you."

SNCC workers in civil rights are "going to be called Communists and radicals," Foreman said.

It's impossible to "bring social change," he continued, "unless people are willing to pay the supreme price. This is not to say we're seeking martyrdom. But segregationists think they can stop us with violence."

A HARD FACT

Dunbar, a former professor of political science, said that to be a Southerner has meant in the past "to be one of the white persons who inherited a certain position in relation to Negroes."

PRYOR, OKLA.
TIMES
D. 3,510

DEC 7 1963

Half Million Negroes Register But Voting Ratio Unchanged

By DON MCKEE

ATLANTA, Ga. (AP) — More than half a million Negroes have registered as voters in 11 Southern states during the past five years but this increase, representing a 43 per cent boost, has brought scant improvement in the ratio of Negro to white voters.

An Associated Press survey shows approximately 1.7 million Negroes among the 14 million voters in this 11-state region. There were an estimated 1.2 million Negro voters in the South in 1958.

Comprising one-fifth of the region's population, Negroes represent a potentially powerful force in politics. Their leaders have been bearing down on voter registration in recent years.

The percentage of Negroes among the total number of registered voters moved up from 10 to 12 per cent in the five-year period.

These are the AP estimates:

1958—White voters 10,329,120; Negro 1,172,369.

1963—White voters 12,285,779; Negro 1,677,706.

These figures represent registration in Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

While complete official data are not available for each state, The AP gathered estimates from state officials, Negro leaders, records where available and the Southern Regional Council which makes a continuing study of Negro registration.

Negro voting now is concentrating in urban areas and reflects steps toward desegregation and more liberal political attitudes on racial issues in many cities.

The 12 per cent of Negroes among total registered voters may well become decisive in some states in the presidential election if the white vote splits nearly even. The Negro vote apparently swung South Carolina to President Kennedy in 1960 for example.

The rural areas of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana and Georgia remain the toughest hurdles in the Negro drive for voting rights.

The widest disparity in Negro population and voting is found in Mississippi where Negroes comprise 42 per cent of the population and 5.3 per cent of the voters.

In Alabama, 30 per cent of the population is Negro and 8 per cent of the voters are Negro.

Only Texas has a larger percentage of Negro voters 14.9 than Negro residents 12 per cent. Of all the 11 states, Tennessee's figures are most nearly proportionate. Its poulation is 16 per cent Negro; its voters 13.3 per cent Negro.

In Texas, intensive "pay your poll tax" campaigns by Negro groups in recent years have resulted in the higher percentage of the Negro population qualifying as voters.

Efforts to register more Negroes as voters have been intensified in the past three years. Mass rallies at churches door-to-door canvassing and distribution of printed material are some of the methods used.

Volunteer workers from other states, often white persons, help teach reading and writing and other qualifications. They escort Negroes to the registrar's office.

Federal action in the field of Negro voter registration has not approached the demands of Negro leaders.

Removal of literacy tests as voting requirement is backed by some Negro groups, including the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee politician who argued, "Seek ye first the political kingdom, and all else will be added unto you."

SNCC workers in civil rights are "going to be called Communists and radicals," Foreman said.

It's impossible to "bring social change," he continued, "unless people are willing to pay the supreme price. This is not to say we're seeking martyrdom. But segregationists think they can stop us with violence."

A HARD FACT

Dunbar, a former professor of political science, said that to be a Southerner has meant in the past "to be one of the white persons who inherited a certain position in relation to Negroes."

The fact that Negroes are Southerners too has been a hard fact for many white Southerners to grasp, he said.

The "tremendous rate of change" in the South has exerted more pressure on many people than they can stand, Dunbar said.

"The world is crowding in on us," he continued. "Some people cannot change. We shall see in our time social wreckage and human wreckage in the South."

CITES TOLERANCE

In the past, Dunbar said, the white Southerner has tended to be completely intolerant of "anything that challenged his racial superiority."

At the same time, Dunbar continued, the white Southerner has been extremely tolerant in other ways, "tolerant of human weakness and human frailty."

The rapid change in the South's racial pattern means, he continued, that "we stand to lose some things."

It is not at all certain, he said, that the elimination of racial intolerance can be done in such a way so that the "tolerance of the whole man can be preserved."

The speakers were introduced by Dr. Samuel D. Cook, chairman of the political science department at Atlanta University.

ASBURY PARK EVENING PRESS
ASBURY PARK, N. J.
D. 40,080 S. 39,701

DEC 8 1963

Negro Voter Registration Increase In South Scarcely I

By DON MC KEE

ATLANTA (AP)—More than half a million Negroes have registered to vote in 11 southern states during the past five years.

But this increase, a 43 per cent boost, has brought scant improvement in the ratio of Negro to white voters.

An Associated Press survey shows about 1.7 million Negroes among the 14 million voters in this 11-state region. There were an estimated 1.2 million Negro voters in the South in 1958.

Negroes, who made up one-fifth of the region's population, represent a potentially powerful force in politics. Their leaders have been bearing down on voter registration in recent years.

The percentage of Negroes among the total number of registered voters moved up from 10 to 12 per cent in the five-year period.

AP Estimates

These are the AP estimates:

1958 — White voters 10,329,120; Negro 1,172,369.

1963 — White voters 12,285,779; Negro 1,677,706.

These figures represent registration in Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

While complete official data are not available for each state, the AP gathered estimates from state officials, Negro leaders, records where available and the Southern Regional Council which makes a continuing study of Negro registration.

Negro voting, now concentrating in urban areas, reflects steps toward desegre liberal political issues in many

The 12 per among total may well bec some states in election if the nearly even. Th parently swung
President John 1960, for examp

cely Improves Ratio

toward desegregation and more liberal political attitudes on racial issues in many cities.

The 12 per cent of Negroes among total registered voters may well become decisive in some states in the presidential election if the white vote splits nearly even. The Negro vote apparently swung South Carolina to President John F. Kennedy in 1960, for example.

The rural areas of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana and Georgia remain the toughest hurdles in the Negro drive for voting rights.

The widest disparity in Negro population and voting is found in Mississippi, where Negroes comprise 42 per cent of the population and 5.3 per cent of the voters.

In Alabama, 30 per cent of the population is Negro and 8 per cent of the voters are Negro.

Only Texas has a larger percentage of Negro voters (14.9) than Negro residents (12 per cent). Of all the 11 states, Tennessee's figures are most nearly proportionate. Its population is 16 per cent Negro; its voters 13.3 per cent Negro.

The disparity of greatest concern to Negro leaders is found in rural areas where Negroes often outnumber white residents and have little voting strength.

In Dallas County, Ala., 55 per cent of the population is Negro, [illegible] Negroes provide only 2.3 per cent of the voters.

East Feliciana Parish, La., has about 2,600 white voters and about 120 Negro voters. The white population is the minority.

Efforts to register more Negroes to vote have been intensified in the past three years. Mass rallies at churches, door-to-door canvassing and distribution of printed material are some of the methods used.

Volunteer workers from other states, often white persons, help teach reading and writing and other qualifications. They escort Negroes to the registrar's office.

Federal action in the field of Negro voter registration have not approached the demands of Negro leaders.

"One man, one vote," said Worth Long, a Negro student worker for SNCC at Selma, Ala.

An example of what Negro voting power can do is provided by Georgia's state government, which turned moderate only this year under the obvious influence of nearly 200,000 Negro voters who helped carry the election for Gov. Carl E. Sanders over segregationist Marvin Griffin.

The Miami Herald
MIAMI, FLA.
D. 342,056 S. 394,039

DEC 8 1963

Stronger U.S. Action Urged

Negroes Trail More in Job Field

The North Carolina Law Review has published a collection of viewpoints and reports on 'Civil Rights and the South,' dealing with the legal and social problems of America's biggest domestic issue. Here are some highlights from the work.

By DON McKEE
Associated Press Staff Writer

ATLANTA — (AP) — Negores are losing ground in employment opportunities under inadequate governmental policies, writes the executive director of the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity.

This view is expressed by John G. Feild, consultant to the Eleanor Roosevelt Foundation, in "Civil Rights and the South," a book-length symposium published by the North Carolina Law Review.

Feild is among 10 contributors to the work which has an introduction by Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy who emphasizes "that the struggle for civil rights is a nationwide problem."

Feild concludes that the employment predicament of the Negro is worse now than it was in 1954.

"Through miscalculation, ignorance or misplaced optimism, the impact of automation upon Negroes . . . has been allowed to reach crisis proportions," Feild writes.

Greater governmental initiative is needed, he argues.

Citing studies by the Department of Labor and the Southern Regional Council, Feild says the nature of the job market has changed drastically; production jobs have decreased and non-production jobs have soared.

★ ★ ★

Berl I. Bernhard, staff director of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, reports on desegregation efforts.

"Progress continues to be slow in the South," Bernhard writes.

He says the U.S. attorney general in the past five years has brought 45 suits involving voter rights in Mississippi, Louisiana, Alabama, Tennessee and Georgia.

On public accommodations, Bernhard adds that the U.S. Supreme Court now faces "the broad question of whether the state has any right to arrest and prosecute protesters for seeking equal access to places of public accommodations."

★ ★ ★

Laurence W. Knowles, law professor at the University of Louisville and advisor to the Civil Rights Commission, describes Southern school segregation as motivated by racial factors, whereas it results from geographical attendance areas in the North and West.

"The South keeps its Negroes out of the neighborhood schools and the North keeps its Negroes in the neighborhood schools," writes Knowles. "Both practices result in educational apartheid."

In rural areas, Knowles says, "The power structure within the Negro community does not encourage desegregation." With few exceptions, rural Negro teachers discourage integration or are noncommittal, he says.

"The reason is simple. Integration will probably mean their jobs."

Knowles says Negro teachers in urban areas are not under such pressure.

"Pupil desegregation in the South has moved with glacial speed," writes Knowles. "Teacher integration has not moved at all."

Federal courts generally have refused to face the problem of teacher integration until desegregation of pupils has been accomplished or progressed substantially, he said.

★ ★ ★

Martin E. Sloane of the office of general counsel Housing and Home Finance Agency, reports that 19 states now maintain some form of fair housing laws. But he concludes:

"Fair housing laws have had no apparent revolutionary effect, either in terms of hampering the housing industry or bringing about truly integrated housing."

Despite the phenomenal growth of fair housing laws and direct action groups on the local level to help integration, Sloane said none of these developments has been in the South.

Arguments against federal legislation as encroachment on state rights and individual liberties are made by, among others, Sen. Sam J. Ervin (D., N.C.).

Ervin calls the proposed civil rights legislation now before Congress the work of "zealots . . . willing to trample on traditional judicial guarantees and to destroy the federal system."

An opposing view is expressed by Arthur E. Sutherland, law professor at Harvard, who says that adoption of the 14th Amendment showed "we had reached the stage where the federal government must assume a greater degree of control over local affairs."

GREENSBORO DAILY NEWS
GREENSBORO, N. C.
D. 91,284 S. 103,452

DEC 8 1963

Negroes Pictured As Losing Ground

BY DON McKEE

ATLANTA, Dec. 7 (AP) Negroes are losing ground in employment opportunities under inadequate governmental policies, writes the executive director of the President's committee on equal employment opportunity.

This view is expressed by John G. Feild, consultant to the Eleanor Roosevelt Foundation, in "Civil Rights and the South," a book-length symposium published by the North Carolina Law Review.

Feild is among 10 contributors to the work which has an introduction by Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy who emphasizes "that the struggle for civil rights is a nationwide problem."

Feild concludes that the employment predicament of the Negro is worse now than it was in 1954.

"Through miscalculation, ignorance or misplaced optimism, the impact of automation upon Negroes . . . has been allowed to reach crisis proportions," Feild writes.

Greater governmental initiative is needed, he argues.

Citing studies by the Department of Labor and the Southern Regional Council, Feild says the nature of the job market has changed drastically; production jobs have decreased and non-production jobs have soared.

Berl I. Bernhard, staff director of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, reports on desegregation efforts.

"Progress continues to be slow in the South," Bernhard writes.

He says the U.S. attorney general in the past five years has brought 45 units involving voter rights in Mississippi, Louisiana, Alabama, Tennessee and Georgia.

On public accommodations, Bernhard adds that the U.S. Supreme Court now faces "the broad question of whether the state has any right to arrest and prosecute protesters for seeking equal access to places of public accommodations."

Laurence W. Knowles, law professor at the University of Louisville and advisor to the civil rights commission, describes Southern school segregation as motivated by racial factors, whereas it results from geographical attendance areas in the North and West.

"The South keeps its Negroes out of the neighborhood schools and the North keeps its Negroes in the neighborhood schools," writes Knowles. "Both practices result in educational apartheid."

In rural areas, Knowles says, "The power structure within the Negro community does not encourage desegregation." With few exceptions, rural Negro teachers discourage integration or are noncommittal, he says.

"The reason is simple. Integration will probably mean their jobs."

Knowles says Negro teachers in urban areas are not under such pressure.

"Pupil desegregation in the South has moved with glacial speed," writes Knowles. "Teacher integration has not moved at all."

Federal courts generally have refused to face the problem of teacher integration until desegregation of pupils has been accomplished or progressed substantially, he said.

Martin E. Sloane of the Office of General Counsel, Housing and Home Finance Agency, reports that 19 states now maintain some form of fair housing law. But he concludes:

"Fair housing laws have had no apparent revolutionary effect, either in terms of hampering the housing industry or bringing about truly integrated housing."

Despite the phenomenal growth of fair housing laws and direct action groups on the local level to help integration, Sloane said none of these developments has been in the South.

Arguments against federal legislation as encouragement on state rights and individual liberties are made by, among others, Sen. Sam J. Ervin, D-N.C.

Ervin calls the proposed civil rights legislation now before Congress the work of "zealots . . . willing to trample on traditonal judicial guarantee and to destroy the federal system."

An opposing view is expressed by Arthur E. Sutherland, law professor at Harvard, who says that adoption of the 14th amendment showed "we had reached the stage where the federal government must assume a greater degree of control over local affairs."

Sutherland concludes the federal government has inclusive control over the national economy in interstate commerce laws—extending beyond control of goods and available "to correct injustice to the Negro."

LYNCHBURG, VA.
NEWS
D. 17,842 S. 28,436

DEC 8 1963

WORSE THAN 1954

Negro Losing Ground In Employment Field

EDITOR'S NOTE—The North Carolina Law Review has published a collection of viewpoints and reports on "Civil Rights and the South, dealing with the legal and social problems of America's biggest domestic issue. Here are some highlights from the work.

By DON MCKEE

ATLANTA, Ga. (AP) — Negroes are losing ground in employment opportunities under inadequate governmental policies, writes the executive director of the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity.

This view is expressed by John G. Feild, consultant to the Eleanor Roosevelt Foundation, in "Civil Rights and the South," a book-length symposium published by the North Carolina Law Review.

Feild is among 10 contributors to the work which has an introduction by Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy who emphasizes "that the struggle for civil rights is a nationwide problem."

Worse Than 1954

Feild concludes that the employment predicament of the Negro is worse now than it was in 1954.

"Through miscalculation, ignorance or misplaced optimism, the impact of automation upon Negroes" has "been allowed to reach crisis proportions," Feild writes.

Greater governmental initiative is needed, he argues.

Citing studies by the Department of Labor and the Southern Regional Council, Feild says the nature of the job market has changed drastically; production jobs have decreased and nonproduction jobs have soared.

Berl I. Bernhard, staff director of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, reports on desegregation efforts.

"Progress continues to be slow in the South," Bernhard writes.

45 Suits

He says the U.S. attorney general in the past five years has brought 45 suits involving voter rights in Mississippi, Louisiana, Alabama, Tennessee and Georgia.

On public accommodations, Bernhard adds that the U.S. Supreme Court now faces "the broad question of whether the state has any right to arrest and prosecute protesters for seeking equal access to places of public accommodations."

Laurence W. Knowles, law professor at the University of Louisville and advisor to the Civil Rights Commission, describes Southern school segregation as motivated by racial factors, whereas it results from geographical attendance areas in the North and West.

"The South keeps its Negroes out of the neighborhood schools and the North keeps its Negroes in the neighborhood schools," writes Knowles. "Both practices result in educational apartheid."

Rural Areas

In rural areas, Knowles says, "the power structure within the Negro community does not encourage desegregation." With few exceptions, rural Negro teachers discourage integration or are noncommittal, he says.

"The reason is simple. Integration will probably mean their jobs."

Knowles says Negro teachers in urban areas are not under such pressure.

"Pupil desegregation in the South has moved with glacial speed," writes Knowles. "Teacher integration has not moved at all."

Federal courts generally have refused to face the problem of teacher integration until desegregation of pupils has been accomplished or progressed substantially, he said.

Martin E. Sloane of the Office of General Counsel, Housing and Home Finance Agency, reports that 19 states now maintain some form of fair housing laws.

But he concludes: "Fair housing laws have had no apparent revolutionary effect, either in terms of hampering the housing industry or bringing about truly integrated housing."

Despite the phenomenal growth of fair housing laws and direction action groups on the local level to help integration, Sloane said none of these developments has been in the South.

Arguments against federal legislation as encroachent on state rights and individual liberties are made by, among others, Sen. Sam J. Ervin, D-N.C.

Ervin calls the proposed civil rights legislation now before Congress the work of "zealots . . . willing to trample on traditional judicial guarantees and to destroy the federal system."

An opposing view is expressed by Arthur E. Sutherland, law professor at Harvard, who says that adoption of the 14th Amendment showed "we had reached the stage where the federal governent must assume a greater degree of control over local affairs."

Sutherland concludes the federal governent has inclusive control o[illegible] national economy in [illegible]tate commerce laws—[illegible]g beyond control of goo[illegible] available "to correct [illegible] to the Negro."

GET THE AD-READING HABIT

nd

ld

ation until desegpils has been ac-progressed sub-
said.

loane of the Office
unsel, Housing and e Agency, reports es now maintain fair housing laws.

cludes: "Fair house had no apparent effect, either in mpering the hous-
or bringing abou ted housing."

e the phenomena ir housing laws and tion groups on the

Minneapolis Tribune
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN,
D. 218,345 S. 654,561

DEC. 8 1963

Negroes Said Losing Ground in Job Picture

By DON McKEE

ATLANTA, Ga.—(AP)—Negroes are losing ground in employment opportunities under inadequate governmental policies, writes the executive director of the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity.

This view is expressed by John G. Field, consultant to the Eleanor Roosevelt Foundation, in "Civil Rights and the South," a book-length symposium published by the North Carolina Law Review.

Field is among 10 contributors to the work which has an introduction by Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy, who emphasizes "that the struggle for civil rights is a nationwide problem."

FIELD CONCLUDES that the employment predicament of the Negro is worse now than it was in 1954.

"Through miscalculation, ignorance or misplaced optimism, the impact of automation upon Negroes . . . has been allowed to reach crisis proportions," Field writes.

Greater governmental initiative is needed, he argues.

Citing studies by the Department of Labor and the Southern Regional Council, Field says the nature of the job market has changed drastically; production jobs have decreased and nonproduction jobs have soared.

BERL I. BERNHARD, staff director of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, reports on desegregation efforts.

"Progress continues to be slow in the South," Bernhard writes.

He says the U.S. attorney general in the past five years has brought 45 suits involving voter rights in Mississippi, Louisiana, Alabama, Tennessee and Georgia.

Laurence W. Knowles, law professor at the University of Louisville and adviser to the Civil Rights Commission, describes Southern school segregation as motivated by racial factors, whereas it results from geographical at-jobs have soared.

BERL I. BERNHARD, staff director of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, reports on desegregation efforts.

"Progress continues to be slow in the South," Bernhard writes.

He says the U.S. attorney general in the past five years has brought 45 suits involving voter rights in Mississippi, Louisiana, Alabama, Tennessee and Georgia.

Laurence W. Knowles, law professor at the University of Louisville and adviser to the Civil Rights Commission, describes Southern school segregation as motivated by racial factors, whereas it results from geographical attendance areas in the North and West.

"THE SOUTH keeps its Negroes out of the neighborhood schools and the North keeps its Negroes in the neighborhood schools," writes Knowles. "Both practices result in educational apartheid."

In rural areas, Knowles says, "The power structure within the Negro community does not encourage desegregation." With few exceptions, rural Negro teachers discourage integration or are noncommittal, he says.

"The reason is simple. Integration will probably mean their jobs."

Knowles says Negro teachers in urban areas are not under such pressure.

"Pupil desegregation in the South has moved with glacial speed," writes Knowles. "Teacher integration has not moved at all."

Federal courts generally have refused to face the problem of teacher integration until desegregation of pupils has been accomplished or progressed substantially, he said.

The Providence Journal
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
D. 61,299 S. 193,108

DEC 8 1963

Negro Job Problem Said to Get Worse

Atlanta—(AP)—Negroes are losing ground in employment opportunities under inadequate governmental policies, writes the executive director of the President's Committee on Equal Opportunity.

This view is expressed by John G. Feild, consultant to the Eleanor Roosevelt Foundation, in "Civil Rights and the South," a book-length symposium published by the North Carolina Law Review.

Mr. Feild is among 10 contributors to the work, which has an introduction by Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy, who emphasizes "that the struggle for civil rights is a nationwide problem."

Mr. Feild concludes that the employment predicament of the Negro is worse now than it was in 1954.

"Through miscalculation, ignorance or misplaced optimism, the impact of automation upon Negroes has been allowed to reach crisis proportions," Mr. Feild writes.

Greater governmental initiative is needed, he argues.

Citing studies by the Department of Labor and the Southern Regional Council, Mr. Feild says the nature of the job market has changed drastically; production jobs have decreased and non-production jobs have soared.

Berl I. Bernhard, staff director of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, reports on desegregation efforts.

"Progress continues to be slow in the South," Mr. Bernhard writes.

He says the U.S. Attorney General in the last five years has brought 45 suits involving voter rights in Mississippi, Louisiana, Alabama, Tennessee and Georgia.

On public accommodations, Mr. Bernhard adds that the U.S. Supreme Court now faces "the broad question of whether the state has any right to arrest and prosecute protesters for seeking equal access to places of public accommodations."

Laurence W. Knowles, law professor at the University of Louisville and adviser to the Civil Rights Commission, describes southern school segregation as motivated by racial factors, whereas it results from geographical attendance areas in the North and West.

"The South keeps its Negroes out of the neighborhood schools and the North keeps its Negroes in the neighborhood schools," writes Professor Knowles. "Both practices result in educational apartheid."

In rural areas, he says, "the power structure within the Negro community does not encourage desegregation." With few exceptions, rural Negro teachers discourage integration or are noncommittal, he says.

"The reason is simple. Integration will probably mean their jobs."

Professor Knowles says Negro teachers in urban areas are not under such pressure.

"Pupil desegregation in the South has moved with glacial speed," writes Professor Knowles. "Teacher integration has not moved at all."

Federal courts generally have refused to face the problem of teacher intergation until desegregation of pupils has been accomplishd or progressed substantially, he said.

Martin E. Sloane of the Office of General Counsel, Housing and Home Finance Agency, reports that 19 states now maintain some form of fair housing laws. But he concludes:

"Fair housing laws have had no apparent revolutionary effect, either in terms of hampering the housing industry or bringing about truly integrated housing."

Despite the phenomenal growth of fair housing laws and direct action groups on the local level to help integration, Mr. Sloane said none of these developments has been in the South.

Arguments against federal legislation as encroachment on state rights and individual liberties are made by, among others, Sen. Sam J. Ervin, D-NC.

Senator Ervin calls the proposed rights legislation now before Congress the work of "zealots willing to trample on traditional judicial guarantees and to destroy the federal system."

An opposing view is expressed by Arthur E. Sutherland, law professor at Harvard, who says that adoption of the 14th Amendment showed "we had reached the stage where the federal government must assume a greater degree of control over local affairs."

FORT LAUDERDALE, FLA.
NEWS SUN-SENTINEL
SAT. & SUN. 73,912

DEC 8 1963

Study Shows Negroes Losing Ground I

The Associated Press

ATLANTA — Negroes are losing ground in employment opportunities under inadequate governmental policies, the executive director of the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity reports.

This view is expressed by John G. Feild, consultant to the Eleanor Roosevelt Foundation, in "Civil Rights and the South," a book-length symposium published by the North Carolina Law Review.

Feild is among 10 contributors to the work which has an introduction by Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy, who emphasizes "The struggle for civil rights is a nationwide problem."

Feild concludes that the employment predicament of the Negro is worse now than it was in 1954.

"Through miscalculation, ignorance or misplaced optimism, the impact of automation upon Negroes . . . has been allowed to reach crisis proportions," Feild writes. Greater governmental initiative is needed, he argues.

Citing studies by the Department of Labor and the Southern Regional Council, Feild says the nature of the job market has changed drastically; production jobs have decreased and non - production jobs have soared.

Berl. I. Bernhard, staff director of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, reports on desegregation efforts.

"Progress continues to be slow in the South," Bernhard writes. He says the U.S. attorney general in the past five years has brought 45 suits involving voter rights in Mississippi, Louisiana, Alabama, Tennessee and Georgia.

On public accommodations, Bernard adds the U.S. Supreme Court now faces "the broad question of whether the state has any right to arrest and prosecute protesters for seeking equal access to places of public accommodations."

Laurence W. Knowles, law professor at the University of Louisville and adviser to the Civil Rights Commission, describes southern school segregation as motivated by racial factors, whereas it results from geographical attendance areas in the North and West.

"The South keeps its Negroes out of the neighborhood schools and the North keeps its Negroes in the neighborhood schools," writes Knowles. "Both practices result in educational apartheid."

In rural areas, Knowles says, "the power structure within the Negro community doe courage desegregation few exceptions, rural teachers discourage in osing Ground In Employment Opportunit hood eeps horles.

"Both practices result in educational apartheid."

In rural areas, Knowles says, "the power structure within the Negro community does not encourage desegregation." With few exceptions, rural Negro teachers discourage integration or are non-committal, he says, adding: "The reason is simple. Integration will probably mean their jobs."

Knowles says Negro teachers in urban areas are not under such pressure.

"Public desegregation in the South has moved with gla speed," Knowles writes. "Tea er integration has not mo at all."

Chicago's AMERICAN
Always On Top Of The News
D. 444,559 S. 554,928

DEC 8 1963

Negroes Losing Ground on Jobs

BY DON McKEE

ATLANTA (AP)—Negroes are losing ground in employment opportunities under inadequate governmental policies, writes the executive director of the President's committee on equal employment opportunity.

This view is expressed by John G. Feild, consultant to the Eleanor Roosevelt Foundation, in "Civil Rights and The South," a book-length symposium published by the North Carolina Law Review.

Feild is among 10 contributors to the work, which has an introduction by Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy, who emphasizes "that the struggle for civil rights is a nationwide problem."

Worse Today

Feild concludes that the employment predicament of the Negro is worse now than it was in 1954.

"Thru miscalculation, ignorance, or misplaced optimism, the impact of automation upon Negroes . . . has been allowed to reach crisis proportions," Feild writes.

Greater governmental initiative is needed, he argues.

Drastic Change

Citing studies by the department of labor and the Southern Regional council, Feild says the nature of the job market has changed drastically; production jobs have decreased and nonproduction jobs have soared.

Berl I. Bernhard, staff director of the commission on civil rights, reports on desegregation efforts:

"Progress continues to be slow in the south."

He says the attorney general in the last five years has brought 45 suits involving voter rights in Mississippi, Louisiana, Alabama, Tennessee, and Georgia.

On public accommodations, Bernhard adds that the Supreme court now faces "the broad question of whether the state has any right to arrest and prosecute protesters for seeking equal access to places of public accommodations."

Compares South, North

Laurence W. Knowles, law professor in the University of Louisville and adviser to the Civil Rights commission, describes southern school segregation as motivated by racial factors, whereas it results from geographical attendance areas in the north and west.

"The south keeps its Negroes out of the neighborhood schools and the north keeps its Negroes in the neighborhood schools," writes Knowles. "Both practices result in educational apartheid."

In rural areas, Knowles says, "the power structure within the Negro community does not encourage desegregation." With few exceptions, rural Negro teachers discourage integration or are noncommittal, he says.

Fear Job Loss

"The reason is simple. Integration probably will mean their jobs."

Knowles says Negro teachers in urban areas are not under such pressure.

Federal courts generally have refused to face the problem of teacher integration until desegregation of pupils has been accomplished or progressed substantially, he said.

Martin E. Sloane of the office of general counsel, housing and home finance agency, reports that 19 states now maintain some form of fair housing laws. But he concludes:

"Fair housing laws have had no apparent revolutionary effect, either in terms of hampering the housing industry or bringing about truly integrated housing."

Despite the phenomenal growth of fair housing laws and direct action groups on the local level to help integration, Sloane said none of these developments has been in the south.

Work of Zealots

Arguments against federal legislation as encroachment on state rights and individual liberties are made by, among others, Sen. Sam J. Ervin [D., S. C.].

Ervin calls the proposed civil rights legislation now before Congress the work of "zealots . . . willing to trample on traditional guarantees and to destroy the federal system."

An opposing view is expressed by Arthur E. Sutherland, law professor in Harvard, who says that adoption of the 14th amendment showed "we had reached the stage where the federal government must assume a greater degree of control over local affairs."

Los Angeles Times
LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 772,439 S. 1,120,153

DEC 8 1963

Negroes Lose Ground on Jobs, Report Says

Impact of Automation Hits Them Hardest as Production Posts Decline, Study Shows

ATLANTA (AP) — Negroes are losing ground in employment opportunities under inadequate governmental policies, writes the executive director of the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity.

This view is expressed by John G. Feild, consultant to the Eleanor Roosevelt Foundation, in "Civil Rights and the South," a book-length symposium published by the North Carolina Law Review.

Feilds is among 10 contributors to the work, which has an introduction by Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy, who emphasizes "that the struggle for civil rights is a nationwide problem."

Feild concludes that the employment predicament of the Negro is worse now than it was in 1954.

Crisis Seen

"Through miscalculation, ignorance or misplaced optimism, the impact of automation upon Negroes. . .has been allowed to reach crisis proportions," Feild writes.

Greater governmental initiative is needed, he argues.

Citing studies by the Department of Labor and the Southern Regional Council, Feild says the nature of the job market has changed drastically; production jobs have decreased and non-production jobs have soared.

Berl I. Bernhard, staff director on the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, reports on desegregation efforts.

"Progress continues to be slow in the South," Bernhard writes.

45 Vote Suits Filed

He says the U.S. attorney general in the past five years has brought 45 suits involving voter rights in Mississippi, Louisiana, Alabama, Tennessee and Georgia.

On public accommodations, Bernhard adds that the U. S. Supreme Court now faces "the broad question of whether the state has any right to arrest and prosecute protesters for seeking equal access to places of public accommodations."

Laurence W. Knowles, law professor at the University of Louisville and advisor to the Civil Rights Commission, describes Southern school segregation as motivated by racial factors, whereas it results from geographical attendance areas in the North and West.

Apartheid Results

"The South keeps its Negroes out of the neighborhood schools and the North keeps its Negroes in the neighborhood schools," writes Knowles. "Both practices result in educational apartheid."

In rural areas, Knowles says, "the power structure within the Negro community does not encourage desegregation." With few exceptions, rural Negro teachers discourage integration or are non-committal, he says.

"The reason is simple. Integration will probably mean their jobs."

Knowles says Negro teachers in urban areas are not under such pressure.

"Pupil desegregation in the South has moved with glacial speed," writes Knowles. "Teacher integration has not moved at all."

Federal courts generally have refused to face the problem of teacher integration until desegregation of pupils has been accomplished or progressed substantially, he said.

Martin E. Sloane of the Office of General Counsel, Housing and Home Finance Agency, reports that 19 states now maintain some form of fair housing laws. But he concludes:

"Fair housing laws have had no apparent revolutionary effect, either in terms of hampering the housing industry or bringing about truly integrated housing."

Despire the phenomenal growth of fair housing laws and direct action groups on the local level to help integration, Sloane said, none of these developments has been in the South.

States Rights Issue

Arguments against federal legislation as encroachment on state rights and individual liberties are made by, among others, Sen. Sam J. Ervin (D-N.C.).

Ervin calls the proposed civil rights legislation now before Congress the work of "zealots . . . willing to trample on traditional judicial guarantees and to destroy the federal system."

An opposing view is expressed by Arthur E. Sutherland, law professor at Harvard, who says that adoption of the 14th Amendment showed "we had reached the stage where the federal government must assume a greater degree of control over local affairs."

Sutherland concludes the federal government has inclusive control over the national economy in interstate commerce laws — extending beyond control of goods and available "to correct injustice to the Negro."

BELVEDERE By Nat Greenwood

"Election bet or not, I still say it's a violation of the city leash ordinance."

HOUSTON CHRONICLE
D. 206,663 S. 243,876
PAGE ONE CERTIFIED
DEC 10 1963

THE NEGRO REVOLUTION

Pledges Made to Help Johnson Push JFK Goal: Equality for All

BY AL KUETTNER
United Press International

Second of Five

"Everything's in a state of suspension," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

"He was our guy," another Negro leader said of the late President Kennedy, whose assassination threw the nation's civil rights picture into indecision.

What are the political implications of civil rights under President Johnson? The question was on the lips of thousands and Johnson himself sought in the early grieving hours of his administration to provide something of an answer.

The new President called together all the governors who could be located shortly after the President's funeral and pledged himself to take up his predecessor's fight to win congressional passage of a civil rights bill. It seemed to have been doomed for this year.

Unfinished Business

"Among President Kennedy's unfinished business is enactment of strong civil rights legislation," said the nation's Negro leaders.

Asserting that "to complete this mission would honor his memory," they pledged their support to help President Johnson achieve President Kennedy's "goal of equality for all our citizens."

From the practical political point of view, both Negro and white sides for the moment have adopted a wait-and-see attitude.

Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., regarded by many Negroes as the nation's No. 1 civil rights leader, expressed confidence that Johnson will follow the path charted by the late President.

No Change In Pressure

Wilkins predicted no real change in the "steady pressure toward enactment of civil rights legislation."

The Rev. Arthur B. Brazier, head of the Coordinating Council of Community Organizations in Chicago, said the civil rights drive will continue unabated.

"We are in hopes that President Johnson will carry the fight as vigorously as did President Kennely," Brazier said. "If the civil rights bill is passed, this will go a long way toward abolishing second class citizenship. If it isn't the drive by

(See BOTH, Page 12)

Both Sides Adopt Practical Wait and See Rights View

FROM PAGE 1

Negroes for equal rights will continue."

In Brazier's view, the Negro voters will be governed next year by "how vigorously President Johnson presses for President Kennedy's civil rights bill and who will be the Republican nominee."

The Chicago Negro leader feels Sen. Barry Goldwater's chances for the GOP nomination were lessened by President Kennedy's death and the likelihood that President Johnson will be the Democratic nominee next year.

In San Francisco, U.S. attorney Cecil Poole, a Negro, said:

"I don't anticipate that the country will relinquish the promises of real progress that President Kennedy symbolized. The President's inspiration and martyrdom alone will serve as a model for progress.

YOUNG FARMER KING BRAZIER WILKINS FORMAN

"After we recover from this heavy period of grief, we will go ahead. The lesson of the Kennedy administration will not be lost on Congress. Congress will move on. We will move on."

Some congressional strategists believe even that President Johnson's appearance on the scene may enhance passage of civil rights legislation because of his recognized mastery of congressional procedure.

Same Opposition

Johnson will find, however, that he has the same opposition from conservative congressmen when civil rights comes up.

Sen. Richard B. Russell, Georgia Democrat and leader of the anti-civil rights strategists, said he was "regretfully pretty sure" he and his old Senate colleague will not see eye to eye on that issue.

Almost any way you look at it—from the North, South, Middle West or Far West—the drive by Negroes for more integrated schooling, more jobs, better housing and the use of public accommodations will be major issues in the year of election.

Just how the Democratic and Republican presidential nominees size up these issues and what they mean to do about them may be presented to a mammoth civil rights convention following the "big two."

Idea for such a convention originated with A. Phillip Randolph, elder statesman of the Negro civil rights move, head of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters and a vice president of the AFL-CIO.

No Endorsement

"The convention would neither organize a political party nor endorse a candidate," Randolph said. "We would invite the nominees to address the convention and we would issue an address to the country containing the record of each candidate on civil rights."

"The national political risk of a strong civil rights position is receiving increased attention from Democratic and Republican leaders as they eye the 1964 election," UPI correspondent William J. Eaton reported from Washington.

One administration official put it another way: "It's hurting like hell."

The late President Kennedy alienated many Southerners with his bold moves in favor of civil rights and his backing of court decisions with the Armed Forces. He sent troops to campuses of the Universities of Mississippi and Alabama to insure court-ordered integration.

Sadness Transcends Politics

But in death there seemed to be some healing of the old wounds.

"Our sadness in Alabama transcends all political considerations," said Alabama Gov. George Wallace, one of the late President's bitterest critics over civil rights. "I hope we can have unity in this country and in the world."

A UPI sampling of Negro opinion shows that many feel their main hope still lies in local Negro-white co-operation. But the White House, as exemplified by the Kennedy program, ran a close second. Negroes questioned placed little hope in a Republican administration.

Voter education drives in the South and a charged-up atmosphere engendered by civil rights field workers aroused Negroes — admittedly always somewhat apathetic about voting — to register in increasing numbers, where they can.

According to the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta, almost a half million Negroes have registered since 1958 in 11 Southern states.

States showing the largest gains were: North Carolina 71,057, Florida 68,313, Texas 45,732 and South Carolina 44,080. Mississippi had an estimated increase of 7847, the smallest gain recorded.

Chicago's AMERICAN
Always On Top Of The News
D. 444,559 S. 554,928
PAG
CO
DEC 10 1963

THE RACIAL REVOLUTION

Johnson Behind Us, Negroes Believe

SOUTHERN REGIONAL COUNCIL

BY AL KUETTNER
United Press International

President Kennedy's assassination came at the height of a fight to win passage of his civil rights bill. In the following dispatch Negro leaders and political strategists evaluate the political aspects of civil rights following President Kennedy's death.

"Everything's in a state of suspension," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

"He was our guy," said another Negro leader of the late President Kennedy, whose assassination threw the nation's civil rights picture into indecision.

Second of a Series

What were the political implications of civil rights under President Johnson? The question was on the lips of thousands and Johnson himself sought in the early grieving hours of his administration to provide something of an answer.

The new President called together all the governors who could be located shortly after President Kennedy's funeral and pledged himself to take up his predecessor's fight to win congressional passage of a civil rights bill. It seemed to have been doomed for this year.

"Among President Kennedy's unfinished business is the enactment of strong civil rights legislation," said the nation's Negro leaders in a statement signed by the Council for United Civil Rights Leadership.

Asserting that "to complete this mission would honor his memory," they pledged their support to help President Johnson achieve President Kennedy's "goal of equality for all our citizens."

From the practical political point of view, both Negro and white sides have for the moment adopted a wait-and-see attitude.

Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., regarded by many Negroes as the nation's number one civil rights leader, expressed confidence that Johnson will follow the path charted by the late President.

"It does not mean a setback," King said.

Wilkins predicted no real change in the "steady pressure toward enactment of civil rights legislation."

The Rev. Arthur M. Brazier, head of the Coördinating Council of Community Organizations in Chicago, said the civil rights drive will continue unabated.

"We hope President Johnson will carry on the fight as vigorously as did President Kennedy," Brazier said. "If the civil rights bill is passed, this will go a long way toward abolishing second class citizenship. If it isn't, the drive by Negroes for equal rights will continue."

In Brazier's view, the Negro voters will be governed next year by "how vigorously President Johnson presses for Presi-

[Continued on page 6, col. 6]

'He Was Our Guy,' Say Negroes of Late President

[Continued from first page]

dent Kennedy's civil rights bill and who will be the Republican nominee."

The Chicago Negro leader feels Sen. Barry Goldwater's chances for the G. O. P. nomination were lessened by President Kennedy's death and the likelihood that President Johnson will be the Democratic nominee next year.

In San Francisco, United States Attorney Cecil Poole, a Negro, said:

"I don't anticipate that the country will relinquish the promises of real progress that President Kennedy symbolized. The President's inspiration and martyrdom alone will serve as a model for progress.

"After we recover from this heavy period of grief, we will go ahead. The lesson of the Kennedy administration will not be lost on Congress. Congress will move on. We will move on."

Some congressional strategists believe that President Johnson's appearance on the scene may enhance passage of civil rights legislation because of his recognized mastery of congressional procedure.

Rights Major Election Factor

Johnson will find, however, that he has the same opposition from conservative congressmen and senators when civil rights comes up.

Sen. Richard B. Russell, Georgia Democrat and leader or the anti-civil rights strategists, said he was "regretfully pretty sure" he and his old Senate colleague will not see eye to eye on that issue.

Almost any way you look at it—from the north, south, middle west or far west—the NEGRO Spokesman Martin Luther King says the death of President Kennedy "does not mean a setback" in the Negro rights struggle.

drive by Negroes for more integrated schooling, more jobs, better housing and the use of public accommodations will be major issues in the year of election.

Just how the Democratic and Republican Presidential nominees size up these issues and what they mean to do about them may be presented to a mammoth civil rights convention following the "big two."

The idea for such a convention originated with A. Phillip Randolph, elder statesman of the Negro civil rights move, head of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters and a vice president of the AFL-CIO.

Admit Racial Vote Can Hurt

"The convention would neither organize a political party nor indorse a candidate," Randolph said. "We would invite the nominees to address the convention and we would issue an address to the country containing the record of each candidate on civil rights."

"The national political risk of a strong civil rights position is receiving increased attention from Democratic and Republican leaders as they eye the 1964 election," UPI correspondent William J. Eaton reported from Washington.

One administration official put it another way: "It's hurting like hell."

The late President Kennedy alienated many southerners with his bold moves in favor of civil rights and his backing of court decisions with the armed forces. He sent troops to campuses of the universities of Mississippi and Alabama to insure court-ordered integration.

Negro Voter Sign-Up Gains

But in his death there seemed to be some healing of the old wounds.

"Our sadness in Alabama transcends political considerations," said Alabama Gov. George Wallace, one of the late President's bitterest critics over civil rights, "I hope we can have unity in this country and in the world."

A UPI sampling of Negro opinion thruout the United States shows that many feel their main hope still lies in local Negro-white coöperation. But the White House, as exemplified by the Kennedy program, ran a close second. Negroes questioned placed little hope in a Republican administration.

Voter education drives in the south and a charged-up atmosphere engendered by civil rights field workers aroused Negroes—admittedly somewhat apathetic about voting—to register in increasing numbers, where they can.

According to the Southern Regional council in Atlanta, almost a half million Negroes have registered to vote since 1958 in 11 southern states.

States showing the largest gains were: North Carolina 71,057, Florida 68,313, Texas 45,732, and South Carolina 44,080. Mississippi had an estimated increase of 7,847, the smallest gain recorded.

TOMORROW: Negro housing —the dilemma.

MACON, GA.
NEWS
D. 23,004

DEC 10 1963

Civil Rights Fight: the Politics of It

President Kennedy's assassination came at the height of a fight to win passage of his civil rights bill. In the following dispatch, the second of five, Negro leaders and political strategists evaluate the political aspects of civil rights following his death.

By AL KUETTNER
United Press International

"Everything's in a state of suspension," said Roy Wilkins, executive secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

"He was our guy," said another Negro leader of the late President Kennedy, whose assassination threw the nation's civil rights picture into indecision.

What were the political implications of civil rights under President Johnson? The question was on the lips of thousands, and Johnson himself sought in the early grieving hours of his administration to provide something of an answer.

The new President called together all the governors who could be located shortly after the President's funeral and pledged himself to take up his predecessor's fight to win congressional passage of a civil rights bill. It seemed to have been doomed for this year.

"Among President Kennedy's unfinished business in the enactment of strong civil rights legislation," said the nation's Negro leaders in a statement signed by the Council for United Civil Rights Leadership.

Asserting that "to complete this mission would honor his memory," they pledged their support to help President Johnson achieve President Kennedy's "goal of equality for all our citizens."

* * *

From the practical political point of view, both Negro and white sides have for the moment adopted a wait-and-see attitude.

Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., regarded by many Negroes as the nation's No. 1 civil rights leader, expressed confidence that Johnson will follow the path charted by the late President.

"It does not mean a setback," King said.

Wilkins predicted no real change in the "steady pressure toward enactment of civil rights legislation."

The Rev. Arthur M. Brazier, head of the Coordinating Council of Community Organizations in Chicago, said the civil rights drive will continue unabated.

"We are in hopes that President Johnson will carry the fight as vigorously as did President Kennedy," Brazier said. "If the civil rights bill is passed, this will go a long way toward abolishing second class citizenship. If it isn't, the drive by Negroes for equal rights will continue."

* * *

In Brazier's view, the Negro voters will be governed next year by "how vigorously President Johnson presses for President Kennedy's civil rights bill and who will be the Republican nominee."

The Chicago Negro leader feels Sen. Barry Goldwater's chances for the GOP nomination were lessened by President Kennedy's death and the likelihood that President Johnson will be the Democratic nominee next year.

In San Francisco, U. S. Atty. Cecil Poole, a Negro, said:

"I don't anticipate that the country will relinquish the promises of real progress that President Kennedy symbolized. The President's inspiration and martyrdom alone will serve as a model for progress.

"After we recover from this heavy period of grief, we will go ahead. The lesson of the Kennedy administration will not be lost on Congress. Congress will move on. We will move on."

Some congressional strategists believe even that President Johnson's appearance on the scene may enhance passage of civil rights legislation because of his recognized mastery of congressional procedure.

* * *

Johnson will find, however, that he has the same opposition from conservative congressmen and senators when civil rights comes up.

Sen. Richard B. Russell, Georgia Democrat and leader of the anti-civil rights strategists, said he was "regretfully pretty sure" he and his old Senate colleague will not see eye to eye on that issue.

Almost any way you look at it — from the North, South, Middle West or Far West — the drive by Negroes for more integrated schooling, more jobs, better housing and the use of public accommodations will be major issues in the year of election.

Just how the Democratic and Republican presidential nominees size up these issues and what they mean to do about them may be presented to a mammoth civil rights convention following the "big two."

Idea for such a convention originated with A. Phillip Randolph, elder statesman of the Negro civil rights move, head of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters and a vice president of the AFL-CIO.

"The convention would neither organize a political party nor endorse a candidate," Randolph said. "We would invite the nominees to address the convention and we would issue an address to the country containing the record of each candidate on civil rights."

* * *

"The national political risk of a strong civil rights position is receiving increased attention from Democratic and Republican leaders as they eye the 1964 election," UPI correspondent William J. Eaton reported from Washington.

One administration official put it another way: "It's hurting like hell."

The late President Kennedy alienated many southerners with his bold moves in favor of civil rights and his backing of court decision with the armed forces. He sent troops to campuses of the universities of Mississippi and Alabama to insure court-ordered integration.

But in death there seemed to be some healing of the old wounds.

"Our sadness in Alabama transcends all political considerations," said Alabama Gov. George Wallace, one of the late President's bitterest critics over civil rights. "I hope we can have unity in this country and in the world."

* * *

A UPI sampling of Negro opinion throughout the United States shows that many feel their main hope still lies in local Negro-white cooperation. But the White House, as exemplified by the Kennedy program, ran a close second. Negroes who were questioned placed little hope in a Republican administration.

Voter education drives in the South and a charged-up atmosphere engendered by civil rights field workers aroused Negroes—admittedly always somewhat apathetic about voting — to register in increasing numbers, where they can.

According to the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta, almost a half - million Negroes have registered to vote since 1958 in 11 southern states.

States showing the largest gains were: North Carolina 71,057, Florida 68,313, Texas 45,732, South Carolina 44,080. Mississippi had an estimated increase of 7,847, the smallest gain recorded.

MORNING ADVOCATE
BATON ROUGE, LA.
D. 45,681 S. 66,530

DEC 13 1963

Politics Plays Big Role in Rights Fight

(EDITOR'S NOTE: Politics has played powerful role in the nation's civil rights movement. It has at times been apparent. Often it has been so subtle or hidden that its role has passed almost unoticed. Here are some of the shades discovered in a UPI nationwide survey, the fourth dispatch in a series.)

By NICHOLAS C. CHRISS
United Press International

One sunny January day this year Leroy R. Johnson walked into the senate chamber of the Georgia capitol and took his assigned seat. For a freshman legislator, Johnson received unusual attention. He was stared at from the moment he stepped onto the capitol grounds. There was a nervous frown on his face.

But he was seated without incident. That was the important thing. No one thought it would be otherwise.

A year ago, or two, four and six years ago, the situation would have been packed with tension, if not impossible.

This was not because Johnson wore a trim Ivy League suit and puffed on a pipe (he later switched to cigars), in a legislature packed with "country boys," or because he represented a big city (Atlanta).

In an era that faded away not long ago in Georgia, Johnson might have been tossed out on his ear if he had even ventured into the white gallery of the Senate chamber because his skin is the color of what the French call cafe au lait, milk-coffee brown.

As a state senator, Johnson is the highest elected Negro official in the South. When the six-week legislative session ended, Johnson had won the respect of his colleagues and uncounted Georgians, white and Negro.

His election from a predominately Negro slice of Atlanta represented one of the biggest tangible political gains by Negroes in Georgia and the South in almost a century. It came with the downfall of the county unit system, a system once nurtured by white politicians from rural areas.

Negroes Get Posts

Increasingly in the South, Negroes are running in elections or are being appointed to municipal and state posts.

Atlanta has had for years a Negro on the city board of education. Last summer the first Negro was appointed to the Tennessee State Board of Education. In Ocilla, Ga., a Negro ran second in a race with two white men for the City Commission. The Winston-Salem, N.C., City Commssion has had a Negro member for two years.

Like a bright red thread, politics is woven throughout the fabric of the civil rights struggle. It has accounted for gains and losses to either side. Sometimes it is in the forefront of the struggle, but more often in the background. It would take a gift of the Magi to measure the full role politics has played, but some of it has already made history.

It was 14 days before the 1960 presidential election that Mrs. Martin Luther King Jr., pregnant and worried about her husband, received a long distance telephone call at her Atlanta home from Democratic candidate John F. Kennedy.

Kennedy expressed concern for Mrs. King's husband who was serving a four-month sentence at the state prison on a charge growing out of a traffic violation.

"He wanted me to know he was thinking about us and he would do all he could to help," Mrs. King said.

Two days later the top Negro integration leader in the nation was freed on $2,000 bond and King has conceded the call swung key votes in key states to the Democrats.

Two Stand Out

During 1963 when racial violence swept across the nation like fire on the wind, two men emerged above all others as being politically motivated or oriented in the civil rights issue. The charges came most often from their opponents and the two were Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy and Alabama Gov. George C. Wallace.

Segregationists claim Kennedy used the Department of Justice to garner votes and prestige for his party and the administration of the late President John F. Kennedy.

Integrationists see Wallace as a racist who struck a pose rather than a stand when he blocked the schoolhouse door in June and temporarily barred two Negroes from the entering the University of Alabama.

Intergrationists say the attorney general did only what the reluctant die-hards in the states forced on him. Segregationists insist Wallace represented the best of the states' rights movement by standing rock-steady against federal might, while at the same time avoiding violence.

Wallace has since declared he will enter several presidential primaries, while admitting he does not conceive of himself as a serious candidate.

The assassination of President Kennedy left civil rights leaders standing on the brink of a chasm, indecisive and confused.

The immediate question confronting them was the status of the "push" their movement had received from the Kennedy administration.

The answer came within a remarkably short time. President Johnson told a group of governors he would continue the fight for passage of the civil rights bill.

The next day Negro leaders vowed their support to the new Chief Executive to accomplish Kenndy's "goal of equality for all our citizens."

Martin Luther King Jr. said Johnson had "a statesmanlike grasp of the problem and a great political sagacity. I think he will realize that civil rights is not one of several issues but is the dominant domestic issue."

Roy Wilkins, head of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, predicted "steady pressure toward enactment of civil rights legislation."

Across the 50 states, Negro leaders reassessed their position and put their faith in the new President.

But there were signs, too, that those who opposed the civil rights legislation were not likely to drop their guard. In Washington that wily master of congressional in-fighting, Sen. Richard B. Russell, D-Ga., said he was still a friend of Johnson's but was "pretty sure" they would disagree on the issue.

Negroes traditionally have voted Democratic since the days of President Franklin D. Roosevelt. A UPI sampling of Negro opinion in the nation showed them still to favor the Democrats by a large margin and if anything the Kennedy adinistration shored up that belief.

If the civil rights organizations can remain united — and they have been known to engage in fierce internal wrangling — they could present a serious consideration to the politicians who will have to pay more attention to civil rights planks in the 1964 presidential year, than ever before.

Negro leaders have already indicated they will demand that each party's candidate sound off loud and clear on his civil rights stand. Backing them up, they have the statistics of growing voting power by Negroes and it is nowhere more apparent than in the South.

In 11 Southern states since 1958, Negroes have piled up almost half a million new voters on registration rolls, according to the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta. The increases have ranged from 71,000 in North Carolina to 8,000 in Mississippi.

THE ATLANTA CONSTITUTION
For 95 Years the South's Standard Newspaper
D. 202,635

DEC 13 1963

Rights Panel To Boycott Biased Areas

The executive committee of the Sotuhern Regional Council has voted to hold its annual meetings only in cities where hotels and restaurants are desegregated.

The Atlanta-based civil rights research group has planned its next annual meeting in Atlanta in January.

This will be the organization's last meeting in Atlanta, however, under present conditions, Leslie Dunbar, executive director of SRC, said Wednesday.

The January meeting, originally scheduled for November, was postponed because of President John F. Kennedy's death.

There are only two hotels in Atlanta where the SRC's white and Negro members can meet, Dunbar said, and both hotels are small.

Atlanta, he said, is a decent, fair-minded city. "It's a shame the people in charge of the hospitality are behaving so rudely."

The executive committee's statement declared that it is an "indignity" to the members of the council, "both white and Negro, to meet in cities where their movement or comfort is restricted and embarrassed. . . ."

LIBRARY JOURNAL
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SEMI-MONTHLY 20,570

DEC 15 1963

Public Library Integration In Thirteen Southern States

By BERNICE LLOYD BELL

This article is drawn from the final short summary chapter of a much longer and detailed study. Mrs. Bell's study, entitled Integration in Public Library Service in Thirteen Southern States, 1954-1962, is a master's thesis completed at the School of Library Service, Atlanta University, in August 1963. We publish this short section here, primarily to draw attention to the complete study, which provides some of the most specific and up-to-date information on the integration of Southern public libraries now available. Copies of the complete study are available in Xerox form, at $6 each, from University Microfilms, 313 North First Street, Ann Arbor, Michigan.

THIS STUDY attempts to depict an over-all view of the trend toward integrated public library service in the South. The following words from the Foreword of a booklet entitled Changing Patterns in the New South (Atlanta: Southern Regional Council, 1955) characterize the Southern library scene: "The South is moving — not always smoothly, but with seeming inevitability — toward an increasingly integrated society."

This statement is verified, in regard to library service, in the Table opposite. As a result of this study, examples of integrated public library service were found to exist in each of the 13 Southern states. This is a marked increase since the Gleason study was made in 1941, which reported only four states having 16 cities with integrated service from the main library.[1] It also shows a rise in the number of states and cities making available the facilities of the main library since the Parker study was made in 1953. The Parker study[2] cited 39 cities in 11 states as compared to 290 in this study.

A total of 448 questionnaires was circulated to libraries in 13 Southern states seeking data concerning public library integration. Only 269 librarians responded either by returning a questionnaire or by writing a letter to explain the local situation. Cooperation was also solicited and received from each of the state library agencies.

Six respondents said the main libraries which they directed were for white patrons only. Another five libraries which received questionnaires were not open to the public on any basis. Fourteen questionnaires were returned with the portion pertaining to service to Negroes unanswered, because no Negroes lived in those cities or towns. Two of these came from Florida, five from Kentucky, four from Oklahoma and three from Tennessee. The librarian in each of the Oklahoma towns indicated that he would offer service to Negroes if they moved into the community and requested it. One librarian in Florida and one in Kentucky voiced the same sentiment. The three librarians in Tennessee towns where Negroes do not reside made no comment regarding the policy they would adhere to if Negroes did become a part of the population.

At least one locality cited in this study has offered service to Negroes from its main library since 1901. Five other public libraries made their facilities available to Negroes prior to 1940. Fifty-seven opened their doors between the years of 1940-1954, and 46 main libraries began serving Negroes after 1955.

One hundred and twenty-four libraries revealed that they served all citizens regardless of color, but offered no specific date as to when this policy was begun. Of these 124 libraries, 39 (or 32 percent) stated that the policy was begun when the library was organized. Six librarians were not sure when the main library was desegregated.

It was discovered from the circulated questionnaires that a total of 244 libraries offered service to Negroes at the main library. The information concerning the additional 46 integrated libraries came from state agency reports, mass media, and personal interviews.

Although the Supreme Court decision of May 17, 1954 had no direct bearing on public library service, 17 of the responding librarians felt that the 1954 decision influenced the action to remove segregation barriers at their libraries. Another 34 library directors were not sure if the ruling had any direct influence or not. One hundred and sixteen librarians felt that it in no way influenced their decision.

According to replies received, Negroes serve on library boards in ten Southern cities. These are Augusta, Georgia; Louisville, Kentucky; Winston-Salem, North Carolina; Frogmore, South Carolina; Austin, Texas; Fort Worth, Texas; Portsmouth, Virginia. Two other cities, Fort Lauderdale and Pensacola, Florida, state that the Negroes are members of branch library boards. Three librarians express the desire to have Negroes elected to serve on boards when there are vacancies. (To this list should be added Savannah, Georgia, and Nashville, Tennessee — see Lj, Feb. 1, '63, p. 537 — Ed.)

Even though the main library in a number of cities is open to all, it is not generally known by the Negro citizen in some places that he has access to it. In five of the communities, the librarians stated that they were not sure whether Negroes know that they may use the main library or not; 15 who returned the questionnaire made no comment about this, and the remaining 181 indicated that Negro citizens were aware of the opportunity. It is interesting to note that the five librarians who said they were not sure if the Negro knew about the availability of library service from the main library admitted that they made no effort to let him know.

Twelve of the public libraries impose age restrictions on all children. The majority of the situations require that the child be six years of age before he can get a library card. Eleven additional libraries seem to impose the age restriction only on Negro children. The libraries in the following places require that the Negro child must be of school age: Delray Beach, Florida; Clarkesville, Georgia; Erlanger, Kentucky; Lindsay, Oklahoma; Elizabethtown, Tennessee; Hopewell, Virginia; and Fort Worth, Texas. Negro children residing in LaFayette, Louisiana must be in high school; those who live in Smithfield, North Carolina must be in the fifth grade; while the public library regulation at Oliver Springs, Tennessee imposes a restriction which says that the Negro must be 14 years of age before he is permitted free use of the main public library.

Many localities from which librarians responded support very meager facilities for the public, Negro and white alike. Some remain open only a few hours per week and offer few of the activities which make for full, well-rounded programs. A total of 59 libraries responding provided no story hour for children. In 36 places where the story hour was featured, the Negro child was neither invited nor welcomed. Another 36 librarians failed to comment in any way about Negro children attending story hours at the main library. However, five librarians indicated that even though the Negro child was not invited he would not be denied the privilege of attending if he did come. One library reported that its story hour is broadcast by radio.

In 15 cases the libraries felt that integrated services had not proven to be more economical than segregated services, while 49 libraries felt that it definitely was cheaper to operate on an integrated basis (24 of these 49 libraries make up the Clinch-Powell regional system, Tennessee). Another 57 reported that they had no means of comparison. Eleven of this 57 revealed that they had either not previously offered any type of service to Negroes, or that the "Negro" branches were still maintained even though Negroes had been afforded the use of the main library. The remaining 46 stated that they had offered integrated service since the

---

Fifteen years ago

In many localities, the integration of the main public library was achieved with a minimum of disturbance. A survey in 1948 by a Birmingham librarian indicated a liberalization of attitudes toward segregation in general and with respect to the libraries in particular. The growing liberal spirit is shown, for instance, in the position of one Southern white librarian, who said: "I have about come to the conclusion that it would be better for all concerned if we removed segregation laws in libraries, universities and cultural institutions." — from "Access to Public Libraries." The Southern white librarian's opinion is quoted from an article by Emily Miller Danton which appeared in Lj, July 1948 establishment of their libraries. Eighty-three respondents failed to answer this question.

A few librarians said that Negroes were employed both on the professional and clerical levels, but no effort has been made to point out the number, nor has an attempt been made to list the areas where this is done. This is due to the fact that even though the questionnaire specifically asked about Negro workers at the main library, in a number of instances the figures supplied had reference to a branch library connected with the system. Many librarians sent information pertinent to their particular situations, but it could not be used for tabulation purposes.

Conclusion

Kentucky, a border state, has made more progress than the remaining 12 states in opening main public library doors to all racial groups. Kentucky cites 67 desegregated main libraries, and Tennessee follows closely in the second position with 63. Virginia offers integrated service at 33 main service points, followed closely by North Carolina and Florida with 32 and 30 respectively. Texas occupies the sixth position with 17 main libraries offering service to the Negro from the main library. Oklahoma cites 16 libraries, Louisiana nine, Georgia eight, Mississippi six, Arkansas and South Carolina both list four, and the State of Alabama lists one. As was pointed out in the Parker study (p. 71), Kentucky, because of its geographical location, "is in a position to be influenced by the customs and practices of both regions [North and South]."

No attempt has been made to evaluate the service which the Negro receives in these 290 libraries. The chief concern has been to locate the areas where the Negro is free to use the main or central public library. Only in three instances was it discovered that the Negro was expected to come to the library, select his books, check them out and leave. Areas where this is the custom are Centerville, Tennessee; Kosciusko, Mississippi; and Biloxi, Mississippi. In the latter two cases, information regarding this practice was obtained by interviews with citizens of the towns rather than from the circulated questionnaire. Both respondents indicated that they were not sure if this was a ruling on the part of the library boards, or if the Negro citizens started this practice themselves.

The courts have accounted for several of the libraries' changes in policy — from a segregated facility to one which serves the Negro along with the white. "Sit-in" or "read-in" demonstrations have been forerunners to some of the court litigations. These protests have been staged in ten (or four percent) of the participating libraries.

Books by or about the Negro can be found in 188 of the libraries; 15 librarians did not answer this question, and only three revealed that they provided no books by, and/or about the Negro. Fifty participating libraries provide magazines which would be of special interest to Negroes, 116 do not, 34 failed to answer the question, and six provided no magazines for their reading public.

At least six librarians felt that "less harm" was done when the library was quietly desegregated and no announcements were made concerning the change in policy. The great disadvantage of this arrangement is that it keeps the Negroes from knowing about the services which are available to them. This may account for the limited use which is made by Negroes in some communities where the policy has been changed but where little or no public announcement of the change was made. It should be noted that none of the libraries which took part in the study intimated that any adverse circumstances had resulted from the decision to remove the segregation barriers.

None of the main libraries which admit Negroes require them to use specific chairs and tables within a room. However, two libraries were reported to have segregated rest rooms.

It appears that the following three cities have made no attempt to desegregate any of their public facilities: Columbia, South Carolina; Jackson, Mississippi; and Birmingham, Alabama. This does not mean that all citizens in these communities are content with the present arrangement, as is evidenced by repeated demonstrations against certain aspects of segregated public facilities.

References:

1) GLEASON, Aliza Atkins. The Southern Negro and the Public Library. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1941.
2) PARKER, Lucretia Jeanette. A Study of Integration in Public Library Service in Thirteen Southern States. Unpublished master's thesis, School of Library Service, Atlanta University, 1953.

POMONA, CALIF.
PROGRESS-BULLETIN
D. 33,784 S. 32,773

DEC 15 1963

Despite Negro Registration

Southern Voter Ratio Unchanged

By DON Mc KEE

ATLANTA, Ga. (AP) — More than half a million Negroes have registered as voters in 11 Southern states during the past five years but this increase, representing a 43 per cent boost, has brought scant improvement in the ratio of Negro to white voters.

An Associated Press survey shows approximately 1.7 million Negroes among the 14 million voters in this 11-state region. There were an estimated 1.2 million Negro voters in the South in 1958.

Comprising one - fifth of the region's population, Negroes represent a potentially powerful force in politics. Their leaders have been bearing down on voter registration in recent years.

The percentage of Negroes among the total number of registered voters moved up from 10 to 12 per cent in the five - year period.

These are the AP estimates:

1958 — White voters 10,329,120; Negro 1,172,369.

1963 — White voters 12,285,779; Negro 1,677,706.

These figures represent registration in Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

While complete official data are not available for each state, The AP gathered estimates from state officials, Negro leaders, records where available and the Southern Regional Council which makes a continuing study of Negro registration.

Negro voting now is concentrating in urban areas and reflects steps toward desegregation and more liberal political attitudes on racial issues in many cities.

The 12 per cent of Negroes among total registered voters may well become decisive in some states in the presidential election if the white vote splits nearly even. The Negro vote apparently swung South Carolina to President Kennedy in 1960, for example.

The rural areas of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana and Georgia remain the toughest hurdles in the Negro drive for voting rights.

The wildest disparity in Negro population and voting is found in Mississippi where Negroes comprise 42 per cent of the population and 5.3 per cent of the voters.

In Alabama, 30 per cent of the population is Negro and 8 per cent of the voters are Negro.

Only Texas has a larger percentage of Negro voters (14.9) than Negro residents (12 per cent). Of all the 11 states, Tennessee's figures are most nearly proportionate. Its population is 16 per cent Negro; its voters 13.3 per cent Negro.

In Texas, intensive "pay your poll tax" campaigns by Negro groups in recent years have resulted in the higher percentage of the Negro population qualifying as voters.

Efforts to register more Negroes as voters have been intensified in the past three years. Mass rallies at churches, door-to-door canvassing and distribution of printed material are some of the methods used.

Volunteer workers from other states, often white persons, help teach reading and writing and other qualifications. They escort Negroes to the registrar's office.

Federal action in the field of Negro voter registration has not approached the demands of Negro leaders.

Removal of literacy tests as voting requirement is backed by some Negro groups, including the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee.

WP 12/18/63

Vote Discrimination Suits Filed in Miss.

Suff. Miss.

United Press International

The Justice Department charged yesterday that voting officials in Copiah and Lauderdale Counties in Mississippi were discriminating against Negroes seeking to register and vote.

Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy announced that suits were filed in Federal court for the Southern District of Mississippi to seek injunctions to halt the alleged discrimination.

One lawsuit named Lauderdale County Registrar of Voters Preston Coleman. The other listed A. B. Weeks, Registrar of Voters in Copiah County as the defendant. Both suits included the State as a defendant.

Kennedy said the suits were filed only after local authorities indicated they were either unable or unwilling to correct the alleged discrimination.

The lawsuits charge that the defendants applied more difficult tests to Negroes seeking to register than they did to white applicants.

The complaint said that 7533 or 8153 whites of voting age are registered in Copiah County, as compared with 25 of 6407 Negroes of voting age.

The Department said comparable figures for Lauderdale County were 13,347 of 27,806 whites registered and 2109 of 11,924 Negroes.

Women's Wear Daily
NEW YORK, N. Y.
D. 51,498

DEC 20 1963

Atlanta Still Trails Magnolia As it Leads the Modern South

It has been said Atlanta is the Belle of the South, that she has accepted modern ways without showing her ankle.

Certainly Atlanta is the showcase of the New South. The influx of industry, the underlying factor for the great changes coming to the Southern states, is nowhere better reflected than in this cosmopolitan center which, somehow, has become a fusion of the bustling new and the elegant old.

The moonlight has a neon tint these days. Gas fumes and diesel exhaust have joined the scent of magnolias. Progress has overtaken the land of grits and gravy and there's a shopping center or a new one-story plant, where once stood the cabin in the cotton. But it is not all new. Many will still give the piercing Rebel yell at any excuse. Hearts still beat fast when the band blares Dixie. There seems to be as many Confederate flags flying in 1963 as in 1863.

There are still areas of social and industrial stagnation—but the New South is moving. Changes are evolutionary and time is the master.

Atlanta is scores of smartly-dressed men and women moving rapidly down Peachtree Street . . . A feeling of energy, of expansion on all sides; wide streets; modern, glass-covered skyscrapers putting one in mind of New York or Chicago . . . Luxury apartment structures starting to appear . . . Overly lavish motels with rates equal to those in northern metropolitan areas . . . Hotels second-rate . . . Most restaurants poor but improving . . . an abundance of personal loan offices . . . smart shops . . . late afternoon traffic jams.

Atlanta is home to 1,100,000 persons . . . It is 26 colleges and universities . . . the distribution center of the Southeast with 4,000 national concerns having offices or warehouses here . . . 55 neighborhood or re-

New homes being built around Atlanta are responsible for our branch program, he pointed out.

Asked to discuss the integration question, Mr. Rich said, "You can't be a little pregnant,"

This is the second of a three-part study on the impact of industrialization in the South. The articles have been written by Harry Jenkins following a trip to various Southern areas. Members of the Fairchild News Service® Southern Staff who contributed to the series include: Cheves Ligon, Charlotte, N. C.; Arnold Pedersen, Greenville, S. C.; Murray Wyche, Tom Watson, Sara Dunbar and Richard Curran, all of Atlanta.

store. Also, he reported, he has hired 50 Negroes and is upgrading some of them.

"Atlanta's population is up 44.5 per cent for the decade, compared with 19 per cent for the entire nation . . . Disposable income for Atlanta is up 83.6 per cent compared with 60.9 per cent for the nation . . . Total retail sales up 77 per cent against 53 per cent for the country . . . Total department store sales up 125.6 per cent against 36 per cent for the nation . . .

"Rich's expects to do $104 million in retail sales in 1963, the largest volume in a single metropolitan market south of New York . . . We plan to open two new branch stores in 1965 in addition to the three now operating . . ."

Peter Stelling, of Rich's, reported the store is undertaking a national advertising program for the first time and its campaign will stress the growing cultural atmosphere of Atlanta.

Atlantans take pride in the fact integration efforts have not been accompanied by violence. Several gave credit to the leadership of the Pulitzer Prize-winning newspaper, the Atlanta Constitution, which has lead the way with its call for moderation. The Southern Regional Council, a civil rights group, claims restaurant desegregation is token, that eating places have quietly set up Negro quotas for each day.

Owners of 10 large hotels and motels have agreed to desegregate, Negro spokesmen charged, but have failed to make their decivision . . . Southern men are pulling away from their women . . ."

Like many other parts of the New South, the influx of industry has converted Huntsville from a dreary cotton mill town to a community unable to contain its boundaries or control its bursting population.

Huntsville, "where space begins," is as good an indication of what is happening in the southern states as Atlanta. In five years, residents of the Old South have been inundated by the flood of scientists and engineers of the Missile Age. Huntsville, which had one Ph.D. degree six years ago—the president of a Negro college—now has more than 700, highest per capita rate in the nation.

Redstone spreads over 60.6 square miles, has 25,000 employes with an annual payroll of over $185 million. It represents a yearly business of $3 billion.

Huge contractor firms have sprung up around the space center and an estimated 2,000 people have found jobs at each one. These companies include: Thiokol, Chrysler, Lockheed, General Electric, Northrup, Hayes International, etc.

Employment in 20 private space industries in the region stands at 12,000. Several firms have plants now under construction and expect to hire an additional 2,200 people.

This boom is expected to extend itself. Marshall Space Flight Center will get $1.7 billion in 1964, compared with $1.2 billion in 1963.

Average arsenal worker or engineer earns more than $7,500 a year. Huntsville's retail sales per household on an annual basis, $4,232. It has a per household income of $6,518 and about 21.3 per cent of per household income is over $10,000.

The results of this influx of people with money to spend has been the same as in many other sections of the New South. Industry to meet their needs, has flocked to the call of profit. Jobs have resulted. With the engineers and scientists have come new ideas, blowing like a fresh wind.

A $3 million research institute is now being built. Here Arsenal personnel will be able to work on advance scholastic degrees. It will cover 225 acres . . . A Huntsville Art

. . . late afternoon traffic jams.

Atlanta is home to 1,100,000 persons . . . It is 26 colleges and universities . . . the distribution center of the Southeast with 4,000 national concerns having offices or warehouses here . . . 55 neighborhood or regional shopping centers of mammoth proportions—one, Lenox Square, covering 74 acres . . . It is nuclear research at Georgia Tech's $4.5 million reactor . . . 16 golf courses . . . 40 movie theaters . . . several community ballet groups . . . an 80-piece symphony, light opera, grand opera . . . little theater groups.

J. Mack Robinson

Atlanta takes pride in its boom town atmosphere. Mack Robinson, who heads insurance and personal finance companies with headquarters here, is a good example of what is happening in this showcase of the New South.

Mr. Robinson, financial backer of Yves St. Laurent, is a big, good-natured, perhaps overly modest man, whose office is comfortable but plain.

"I began business with Dixie Finance Corp. in 1948, with one office just a block or so from here. I have 50 offices throughout the South now."

Mr. Robinson said he had just purchased an acre of land adjoining his home for $19,000. 15 years ago, this same plot would have gone for $2,000.

"Competition is not as tough here as in the North, he smiled, "but it's growing."

Richard H. Rich, board chairman of Rich's, Inc., a slender, handsome, gray-haired man speaks with quiet conviction: "Change in tastes here can be seen in our upgrading of lines. We deal in both mass and quality business but there has been a rise in calls for better things. This is the land of the future."

so he has desegregated eating places in his for the first time and its campaign will stress the growing cultural atmosphere of Atlanta.

Atlantans take pride in the fact integration efforts have not been accompanied by violence. Several gave credit to the leadership of the Pulitzer Prize-winning newspaper, the Atlanta Constitution, which has lead the way with its call for moderation. The Southern Regional Council, a civil rights group, claims restaurant desegregation is token, that eating places have quietly set up Negro quotas for each day.

Owners of 10 large hotels and motels have agreed to desegregate, Negro spokesmen charged, but have failed to make their decisions public in fear of the consequences. Younger members of the Negro groups have urged picketing, boycotts and sit-ins but have been restrained by older members, who prefer negotiation.

The Piedmont Driving Club stems from the horse and carriage days in Atlanta. It has a family atmosphere and in spite of its exclusiveness—most memberships handed down—fine meals prepared by imported chefs from France and The Netherlands are available at amazingly modest prices ($3.50 for some dinners). There is a $1,500 initial fee . . . no golf, but tennis and squash are popular . . . Elegant balls are held in the big room which has retained its original appearance and atmosphere . . . People here not competing with each other, though men and women dress in good taste . . . The little black cocktail dress, fine jewelry, furs, are everywhere in casual evidence .

The Cherokee Country Club is for the young executive crowd, some of whom are comparatively new to the city. It is a large converted mansion and carriage house luxuriously furnished. Its atmosphere is one of studied relaxation . . . eople are in their 30s and 40s, smartly dressed . . . not of the social level of Piedmont . . . There is considerable competition between well-dressed members.

Some improvement is beginning in public eating places . . . Hart's on Peachtree Street is generally regarded as being among the ten best restaurants in the world .

Lickskillet Farm Club . . . A new addition . . . 25 miles from Atlanta, overlooking a histric creek .

"The South has a tradition of elegance, of the long gown, winding staircase, the incomparable feminity of its women, but internationalism has changed the Southern scene and it will change even more."

The speaker is Dr. Wilhelmus Bryan, one of the city's newest leaders in the arts.

"The thing that held back the South for so long was poverty . . . abysmal poverty . . . the memory of poverty . . .fear of poverty and the trend to make do with what it had. The enlightened leaders of the South are trying to lead it into its rightful position in humanity . . . Many would-be dynamic men of the South have thwarted by Southern women . . . many were smothered in their cribs by dominating mothers . . . As the South emerges into the fourth generation since the War Between The States, it will no longer have to import men of meet their needs, has flocked to the call of profit. Jobs have resulted. With the engineers and scientists have come new ideas, blowing like a fresh wind.

A $3 million research institute is now being built. Here Arsenal personnel will be able to work on advance scholastic degrees. It will cover 225 acres . . . A Huntsville Art

Richard H. Rich

Council has come into being . . . Huntsville now has a symphony orchestra.

Memorial Highway has about ten miles of modern shops, shopping centers, service installations stretching along both of its flanks. Birmingham has moved up to where the business is. Pizitz is there and Lovemen's will follow in 1964. Huntsville is now the nation's third fastest growing market . . .

Birmingham, not very far away, is a vivid example of what new industry from the North can mean. Birmingham has enjoyed very little of the new plants growing up in other sections. The coal and steel industry is at once its greatest asset — and its greatest liability.

It is a highly unionized industry, Birmingham's wage scales are higher than in most Southern cities. So new business has sought areas where labor costs are lower.

Racial unrest has discouraged industry too, people in other sections of the South point out. The boom-town atmosphere of Atlanta is nowhere in evidence in Birmingham.

"Birmingham is not dead, hurt yes, but not dead."

This is the terse observation of Mayor Albert Boutwell.

There is hope. An advisory committee of both races is beginning to function . . . Plans are reported for about $35 million in steel facility expansion . . . A group of downtown businessmen is sparking a drive to remodel most of the city's dilapidated store buildings . . . But the big impression one carries away from this city is of the striking contrast with the New South.

—HARRY JENKINS

DAILY NEWS RECORD
NEW YORK, N.Y.
D. 22,726
PAGE ONE
CERTIFIED
DEC 20 1963

WATCH

The Belle That Was Atlanta Is Now a Ding-Dong Modern

GLYNN SOUTH REGIONAL COUNCIL

It has been said Atlanta is the Belle of the South, that she has accepted modern ways without showing her ankle.

Certainly Atlanta is the showcase of the New South. The influx of industry, the underlying factor for the great changes coming to the Southern states, is nowhere better reflected than in this cosmopolitan center which, somehow, has become a fusion of the bustling new and the elegant old.

The moonlight has a neon tint these days. Gas fumes and diesel exhaust have joined the scent of magnolias. Progress has overtaken the land of grits and gravy and there's a shopping center or a new one-story plant, where once stood the cabin in the cotton. But it is not all new. Many will still give the piercing Rebel yell at any excuse. Hearts still beat fast when the band blares Dixie. There seems to be as many Confederate flags flying in 1963 as in 1863.

In the old clubs, barriers are up against newcomers and even when a clubhouse is rehabilitated, it is carefully redone as an exact replica of what it was when Confederate gray thronged the streets.

This is the second of a three-part study on the impact of industrialization in the South. The articles have been written by Harry Jenkins following a trip to various Southern areas. Members of the Fairchild News Service® Southern Staff who contributed to the series include: Cheves Ligon, Charlotte, N. C.; Arnold Pedersen, Greenville, S. C.; Murray Wyche, Tom Watson, Sara Dunbar and Richard Curran, all of Atlanta.

There are still areas of social and industrial stagnation—but the New South is moving. Changes are evolutionary and time is the master.

Atlanta is scores of smartly-dressed men and women moving rapidly down Peachtree Street . . . A feeling of energy, of expansion on all sides; wide streets; modern, glass-covered skyscrapers putting one in mind of New York or Chicago . . . Luxury apartment structures starting to appear . . . Overly lavish motels with rates equal to those in northern metropolitan areas . . . Hotels second-rate . . . Most

See NEW SOUTH, Page 4

Richard I. Rich

Richard I. Rich

22-story Georgia Power Co., Atlanta
Redstone Arsenal, Huntsville, Ala.

new $OUTH part II

Continued from Page One

restaurants poor but improving . . . an abundance of personal loan offices . . . smart shops . . . late afternoon traffic jams.

Groups of tall office structures, a la Rockefeller Center, complete with fountains and statues.

Atlanta is home to 1,100,000 persons . . . It is 26 colleges and universities . . . the distribution center of the Southeast with 4,000 national concerns having offices or warehouses here . . . 55 neighborhood or regional shopping centers of mammoth proportions—one, Lenox Square, covering 74 acres . . . It is nuclear research at Georgia Tech's $4.5 million reactor . . . 16 golf courses . . . 40 movie theaters . . . several community ballet groups . . . an 80-piece symphony, light opera, grand opera . . . little theater groups.

Atlanta takes pride in its boom town atmosphere. Mack Robinson, who heads insurance and personal finance companies with headquarters here, is a good example of what is happening in this showcase of the New South.

Mr. Robinson, financial backer of Yves St. Laurent, is a big, good-natured, perhaps overly modest man, whose office is comfortable but plain.

"I began business with Dixie Finance Corp. in 1948, with one office just a block or so from here. I have 50 offices throughout the South now."

"Atlanta is moving. There are so many developments on the drawing boards, it would amaze you. In the next few years, sub-divisions will spring up over a 20-mile area.

Mr. Robinson said he had just purchased an acre of land adjoining his home for $19,000. 15 years ago, this same plot would have gone for $2,000.

"Competition is not as tough here as in the North, he smiled, "but it's growing."

Richard H. Rich, board chairman of Rich's, Inc., a slender, handsome, gray-haired man speaks with quiet conviction: "Change in tastes here can be seen in our upgrading of lines. We deal in both mass and quality business but there has been a rise in calls for better things. This is the land of the future."

New homes being built around Atlanta are responsible for our branch program, he pointed out.

Asked to discuss the integration question, Mr. Rich said, "You can't be a little pregnant," so he has desegregated eating places in his store. Also, he reported, he has hired 50 Negroes and is upgrading some of them.

"The long-range objectives of the Negro are understandable," Mr. Rich stated. "Some leaders are sincere, dedicated, reasonable people. But there are splinter groups in the Negro movement that make a fetish of militancy. They are as bad as white supremists."

"Atlanta's population is up 44.5 per cent for the decade, compared with 19 per cent for the entire nation . . . Disposable income for Atlanta is up 83.6 per cent compared with 60.9 per cent for the nation . . . Total retail sales up 77 per cent against 53 per cent for the country . . . Total department store sales up 125.6 per cent against 36 per cent for the nation . . .

"Rich's expects to do $104 million in retail sales in 1963, the largest volume in a single metropolitan market south of New York . . . We plan to open two new branch stores in 1965 in addition to the three now operating . . ."

Peter Stelling, of Rich's, reported the store is undertaking a national advertising program for the first time and its campaign will stress the growing cultural atmosphere of Atlanta.

Atlantans take pride in the fact integration efforts have not been accompanied by violence. Several gave credit to the leadership of the Pulitzer Prize-winning newspaper, the Atlanta Constitution, which has lead the way with its call for moderation. The Southern Regional Council, a civil rights group, claims restaurant desegregation is token, that eating places have quietly set up Negro quotas for each day.

Owners of 10 large hotels and motels have agreed to desegregate, Negro spokesmen charged, but have failed to make their decisions public in fear of the consequences. Younger members of the Negro groups have urged picketing, boycotts and sit-ins but have been restrained by older members, who prefer negotiation.

One restaurant—all the chicken you can eat for $1.25—runs a series of newspaper advertisements listing — and denouncing — integrationists.

Atlantans admit to a lunatic fringe but are quick to remind that the North and West have the same problems. Several relaxed only after assurances from this reporter that he was not in the South to write a "pre-conceived" story.

The Piedmont Driving Club stems from the horse and carriage days in Atlanta. It has a family atmosphere and in spite of its exclusiveness—most memberships handed down—fine meals prepared by imported chefs from France and The Netherlands are available at amazingly modest prices ($3.50 for some dinners). There is a $1,500 initial fee . . . no golf, but tennis and squash are popular .. . Elegant balls are held in the big room which has retained its original appearance and atmosphere . . . People here not competing with each other, though men and women dress in good taste . . . The little black cocktail dress, fine jewelry, furs, are everywhere in casual evidence .

The Cherokee Country Club is for the young executive crowd, some of whom are comparatively new to the city. It is a large converted mansion and carriage house luxuriously furnished. Its atmosphere is one of studied relaxation . . . eople are in their 30s and 40s, smartly dressed . . . not of the social level of Piedmont . . . There is considerable competition between well-dressed members.

Some improvement is beginning in public eating places . . . Hart's on Peachtree Street is generally regarded as being among the ten best restaurants in the world . . . Bill Hart presides in his mansion turned-eating-spot and the menu is tops . . . roast whole boneless chicken, wild rice stuffing, pate de foie gras seasoning, tenderloin tips in Burgundy wine a la Deutsch.

Lickskillet Farm Club . . . A new addition . . . 25 miles from Atlanta, overlooking a histric creek . . . A 120-year-old farm house, beautiful red brick original fireplace that dominates main room . . . Bourbon, South's favorite drink, costs $1.25 a shot . . . Cheapest meal is $5 . . .

"The South has a tradition of elegance, of the long gown, winding staircase, the incomparable feminity of its women, but internationalism has changed the Southern scene and it will change even more."

The speaker is Dr. Wilhelmus Bryan, one of the city's newest leaders in the arts.

"The thing that held back the South for so long was poverty . . . abysmal poverty . . . the memory of poverty . . .fear of poverty and the trend to make do with what it had. The enlightened leaders of the South are trying to lead it into its rightful position in humanity . . . Many would-be dynamic men of the South have thwarted by Southern women . . . many were smothered in their cribs by dominating mothers . . . As the South emerges into the fourth generation since the War Between The States, it will no longer have to import men of vision . . . Southern men are pulling away from their women . . ."

Dr. Bryan looks toward the day when Atlanta will have a total school of the arts, design, drama, dance, music, sculpture . . .

The stars that "Fell On Alabama" were little more than a cosmic disturbance compared to the space activities that today rock Huntsville, Ala.

Like many other parts of the New South, the influx of industry has converted Huntsville from a dreary cotton mill town to a community unable to contain its boundaries or control its bursting population.

Today, Redstone Arsenal's operations extend from Huntsville to Cape Kennedy (formerly Canaveral) Fla., to Ascension Island down the Atlantic Missile Range, to Point Mugu, Cal., and Kwajalein Island.

Huntsville, "where space begins," is as good an indication of what is happening in the southern states as Atlanta. In five years, residents of the Old South have been inundated by the flood of scientists and engineers of the Missile Age. Huntsville, which had one Ph.D. degree six years ago—the president of a Negro college—now has more than 700, highest per capita rate in the nation.

Redstone spreads over 60.6 square miles, has 25,000 employes with an annual payroll of over $185 million. It represents a yearly business of $3 billion.

Huge contractor firms have sprung up around the space center and an estimated 2,000 people have found jobs at each one. These companies include: Thiokol, Chrysler, Lockheed, General Electric, Northrup, Hayes International, etc.

Employment in 20 private space industries in the region stands at 12,000. Several firms have plants now under construction and expect to hire an additional 2,200 people.

This boom is expected to extend itself. Marshall Space Flight Center will get $1.7 billion in 1964, compared with $1.2 billion in 1963.

Average arsenal worker or engineer earns more than $7,500 a year. Huntsville's retail sales per household on an annual basis, $4,232. It has a per household income of $6,518 and about 21.3 per cent of per household income is over $10,000.

The results of this influx of people with money to spend has been the same as in many other sections of the New South. Industry to meet their needs, has flocked to the call of profit. Jobs have resulted. With the engineers and scientists have come new ideas, blowing like a fresh wind.

A $3 million research institute is now being built. Here Arsenal personnel will be able to work on advance scholastic degrees. It will cover 225 acres . . . A Huntsville Art Council has come into being . . . Huntsville now has a symphony orchestra.

Memorial Highway has about ten miles of modern shops, shopping centers, service installations stretching along both of its flanks. Birmingham has moved up to where the business is. Pizitz is there and Lovemen's will follow in 1964. Huntsville is now the nation's third fastest growing market . . .

Birmingham, not very far away, is a vivid example of what new industry from the North can mean. Birmingham has enjoyed very little of the new plants growing up in other sections. The coal and steel industry is at once its greatest asset — and its greatest liability.

It is a highly unionized industry, Birmingham's wage scales are higher than in most Southern cities. So new business has sought areas where labor costs are lower.

Racial unrest has discouraged industry too, people in other sections of the South point out. The boom-town atmosphere of Atlanta is nowhere in evidence in Birmingham. The spotlight of world attention has been beating down on this city and the backwash of race tension publicity has affected business downtown. Many shoppers have been discouraged from going downtown in the face of the threats of violence.

"Birmingham is not dead, hurt yes, but not dead."

This is the terse observation of Mayor Albert Boutwell.

There is hope. An advisory committee of both races is beginning to function . . . Plans are reported for about $35 million in steel facility expansion . . . A group of downtown businessmen is sparking a drive to remodel most of the city's dilapidated store buildings . . . But the big impression one carries away from this city is of the striking contrast with the New South.

[Monday: The Carolinas]

—HARRY JENKINS

ARKANSAS DEMOCRAT
LITTLE ROCK, ARK.
D. 84,691 S. 103,346

DEC 24 1963

Our Readers' Views

(To our readers: This is your column. You are invited to use it as an open forum for discussing matters of general interest. You may use a pen name or initials if you wish but we must have your name and address as warrant of good faith.—The Editor.)

Back to Bible

Dear Editor: Most families among mankind today are unhappy. In these days when sickness, death and disunity are the major items of news, I would like to brighten the days by showing you briefly the Bible promise of better conditions to come on earth. Certainly you would enjoy receiving good news for a change. The Bible, in Revelations 21:3-4, gives this good news:

"With that, I heard a loud voice from the throne say: Look! The tent of God is with mankind, and He will desire with them, and they will be His people. And God Himself will be with them. And He will wipe out every tear from their eyes, and death will be no more, neither will mourning nor outcry nor pain be any more. The former things have passed away."

You may wonder, though, how this can come about in view of the seemingly permanent gloomy conditions on earth.

It could only be through the power of God and His Kingdom (Matt. 6:9-10) to destroy the powers that bring evil conditions on earth. Daniel 2:44 tells how.

The Bible shows we need to have the right knowledge to understand what is coming on the earth and how we may gain everlasting life under perfect conditions. We are advised by Jesus (John 17:13.):

"This means everlasting life, their taking knowledge of you, the only true God, and the one whom you sent forth, Jesus Christ."

FRED ELLIOTT,
North Little Rock.

They Say Today:

"The Bible shows we need to have the right knowledge to understand what is coming on the earth and how we may gain everlasting life." Fred Elliott.

"Riot-turmoil-drivers, such as the one staged in Birmingham recently, are financed in nationwide appeals."—Southerner.

Integration Money

Dear Editor: Totals of the combined budgets of five anti-segregation organizations, and portions of the budget of another anti - segregation organization, reported by the New York Times, The Augusta Courier, and The Report to America, for the year 1963 far exceeds $8 million.

Those organizations and their budgets as reported by these newspapers are:

National Urban League, $4,500,000; NAACP (general), $1,120,000; NAACP (legal defense and educational fund) is expected to exceed $1 million; The Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), $750,000; Martin Luther King's Southern Christian Leadershsip Conference, $735,534; Southern Regional Council (Division for Negro Voter), $250,000; Student Non-violent Coordination Committee, $160,000.

This year's budgets for several of the above organizations are being supplemented with funds donated through half and three-quarter - page advertising in some of the nation's leading daily newspapers, for additional funds, according to The Report to America.

Riot-turmoil-drivers, such as the one staged in Birmingham recently, are financed in nationwide appeals; the responses are more than generous.

SOUTHERNER,
Little Rock.

Sick Minds

Dear Editor: It seems all of us should make a resolution—now—that we will never again feed the flames of hate in the minds of people, especially those who are mentally ill. In about every community there are, no doubt, people that need psychiatric treatment, people who are maladjusted, that have the idea they are persecuted, and who are covering a feeling of inferiority through pretending to be superior.

There are paranoics in desperate need of proper psychiatric treatment. Treat these sick minds, don't inflame them.

C. R. BABER,
North Little Rock.

BROOKLINE, MASS.
JEWISH TIMES
W. 8,000

DEC 26 1963

AJC B&P Division To Hear Dr. Zinn

Dr. Howard Zinn, professor of political science at Spelman College, Atlanta, Ga., will address the Business & Professional Division, American Jewish Congress at its monthly luncheon Jan. 3 at 70 Franklin Street.

Dr. Zinn has written extensively for the Nation and other publications on Negro problems and activities in the South, and particularly about the Albany, Georgia situation. He will describe his experiences there and how it has affected other minorities, especially Jews.

A year ago, Dr. Zinn prepared a pamphlet for the Southern Regional Council "Albany - a Study in National Responsibility," which drew national attention to the critical situation in Albany.

Edward J. Barshak, chairman of the B&P Division will preside at the meeting. Gerald A. Berlin, CLSA director for the region will report on the legislative program of AJCongress for the 1964 session of the General Court. Reservations for the luncheon may be made at the AJCongress office, 72 Franklin Street, Boston, LI 2-0265.

THE COMMERCIAL APPEAL
MEMPHIS, TENN.
D. 216,858 S. 260,847

DEC 29 1963

Dr. Silver Is Given Cheers By 'Studying Mississippian'

To The Commercial Appeal:

This letter is in collective response to four published in The Commercial Appeal (Dec. 15) regarding the now-famed speech entitled Mississippi: The Closed Society (not "closed to society") by Dr. James Silver.

Perhaps all four writers can agree with one observation, as a premise. Until most recently the University of Mississippi was more renowned for its Pf. Fs or Pf. Ps (Prowess for Football or Pulchritude) than for its Ph. Ds in other departments. Fortunately—for the reputation of Ole Miss—Dr. Silver's History Department has held high the standards of incorruptible integrity and objectivity.

(It is notable that the Common Market countries of Europe are courageously inaugurating a new look at their own history; one with less emotional and boundary-bias. And since most of our legal precedents—along with our antecedents—stem from Europe, maybe it's time for us to re-examine ours.)

In re-examining the four letters one notes that two are concerned about excerpted remarks; not only those of Dr. Silver but of one Bradley Lawrence, of whom, and of which, I'm not informed.

But, like other thoughtful citizens, I also feel deprived when I'm fed only scraps of any major message. Thus I took the simple, direct action available to all Americans: I wrote Dr. Silver inquiring how I might obtain a full copy. It arrived promptly, mimeographed by the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta. I recommend it to all Mid-and-Deep-Southern studiers.

Let these also be reminded that Dr. Silver's address was given in his capacity as president of the Southern Historical Association, a position not come by through political appointment but only through merit and esteem, as earned from his colleagues. It remains to be seen what his honesty may cost him.

As to the charge that Dr. Silver is an "outsider" (because he isn't a "native," though having shared his life and learning with all who would learn, for 30 years) my note to him stated that I—though a "native" — am considered by some to be an "outsider," because I can't "go with" antiquated notions of the (so-called) Citizens Councils. (Surely even its members have read enough history to recall that our Southern forebears—in that lamentable Lost Cause—sought "outsider" help anywhere . . . and that it was never received officially, from any country . . . Do the citizens Councils wish us to seek another Lost Cause?)

Mississippi's political stance so indicates: it was Kayo The Kennedys, along both party lines. And they all got their ugly wish. (How insular, in insult, can we get?)

Let's examine our American habit of summing up groups or agencies with the obvious initials, and permit me one such semantic example. If we began with Automatic Superiority-Supremacy for Establishment, Southern, we would wind up with ASSES. (Inc. would come next.)

MISSISSIPPIAN WHO STUDIES HISTORY

Memphis.

COLUMBUS, MISS.
COMMERCIAL DISPATCH
D. 9,063 S. 9,063

DEC 29 1963

Negro Revolt Boiled Down To Two Demands

ATLANTA (UPI)—The Southern Regional Council Saturday boiled the so - called negro revolt of 1963 down to a matter of two "just demands."

"One is that there be an end now to all forms of institutionized segregation and discrimination; on this there can be no viable compromise.

"The other is that affirmative measures be adopted to integrate negroes and other minorities into free participation in the nation's public life and economy."

The council, which describes itself as an organization to attain the ideals and practices of equal opportunity for all peoples in the South, explained the demands in an end of the year statement made through its executive committee. The council makes its headquarters in Atlanta.

The statement called for legislative and executive actions by the local, state and federal governments to see demands turned into reality.

"Under our system of federalism, most of the issues of civil rights and race relations could be settled by action of local and state governments," the statement said.

"Only their failure to do so has caused the federal government to intervene and continues to make strong federal action necessary, because the condition of our constitutional rights and of our race relations is a national burden and disgrace.

"In this connection, we take great encouragement from those federal court decisions and those state enactments which are ending to some extent the vicious and undemocratic apportionment of seats in our legislatures and in Congress. There is good reason to hope that as urban centers of the South are accorded their fair representation, and government thereby becomes responsive to majority opinion and needs, a new and more responsible politics will grow up in the South.

'The increase of federal concern and activity in recent years had done much good. America is a better land because of the brilliant thrust of President John Fitzgerald Kennedy's moral and political leading and because of President Johnson's resolve to 'move forward to eliminate from this nation every trace of discrimination and oppression.'"

MILWAUKEE JOURNAL
D. 373,657 S. 561,118
PAGE ONE CERTIFIED
DEC 30 1963

Links Attitudes, Race Bombings

Atlanta, Ga. — AP — Bombings and killings caused by racial hatred only occur in areas where official and community attitudes tolerate such violence, the Southern Regional council said in a statement Sunday.

The council, made up of white and Negro leaders working for closer racial relations, said there was a need for strengthening the leadership of the south.

The report added: "White Southerners have a much inferior record of loyalty to the principles of America and of the Judeo-Christian religion."

The council declared they had been subverted by such organizations as the Ku Klux Klan.

Los Angeles Times
LARGEST CIRCULATION IN THE WEST
D. 772,439 S. 1,120,153
DEC 30 1963

Racial Violence Linked to Sluggish Officials

ATLANTA (AP)—Bombings and killings caused by racial hatred occur only in areas where official and community attitudes tolerate such violence, the Southern Regional Council said in a statement Sunday.

The council, made up of white and Negro leaders working for closer racial relations, said there was a need for strengthening the leadership of the South.

"Demonstrations are direct reaction to the failure or the laggardness of white leadership," the council said. "The public leaders of the South have it in their power at any time to stop demonstrations by satisfying the demands of the federal constitution, of justice and of religion."

The report added:

"We are little impressed by public opinion polls which reveal Negro bitterness or white prejudice. No informed and intelligent observer has ever doubted the existence of either."

The council said bitterness and prejudice were factors that responsible institutions must contend with and rectify.

"White southerners," the statement said, "have a much inferior record of loyalty to the principles of America and of the Judeo-Christian religion."

The council declared they had been subverted by such organizations as the Ku Klux Klan and White Citizens Councils.

The statement was issued by the council's Atlanta based executive committee.

THE MIAMI NEWS
MIAMI, FLA.
D. 154,397 S. 137,140
DEC 30 1963

U. S. Labor Secretary Willard Wirtz said the law profession is "the worst integrated and worst segregated group in our society."

* * *

The Southern Regional Council called for continuing federal leadership in civil rights.

The Atlanta Journal
"COVERS DIXIE LIKE THE DEW"
D. 259,003

DEC 30 1963

Biracial Council Lauds Marchers

By WALTER RUGABER

The Southern Regional Council issued a rare policy statement Monday in which it endorsed racial protest demonstrations and called for continuing federal leadership in civil rights.

The council, a biracial organization headquartered in Atlanta, is mainly devoted to research activities. Its year-end pronouncements were made by a 15-member executive committee.

"Only the self-blinded fail to see the grandeur of the protest movement which since early 1960 has surged through the South," the council asserted.

"A wise society would encourage and applaud this discontent with inferior status, especially as its end result is to make more secure the rights of all."

THE STATEMENT commended Negroes and whites who, through "orderly demonstrations," have used "the methods of democracy to advance human rights."

"We commend their leaders," the council continued, "who have constantly taught that demonstrations must be nonviolent, in spirit as well as in form."

Turning to the matter of federal action, the statement said that "the increase of federal concern and activity in recent years has done much good."

"Under our system of federalism," the council declared, "most of the issues of civil rights and race relations could be settled by action of local and state governments."

"ONLY THEIR FAILURE to do so has caused the federal government to intervene and continues to make strong federal action necessary. . . ."

None of the civil rights issues is likely to be settled, the council said, until unemployment is substantially reduced and educational opportunities are equalized.

". . . Federal leadership in these intricately related fields . . . is a continuing necessity. . . . Job security has become an onnipresent motive for demonstrations."

THE COUNCIL commended Southern cities which have established effective biracial committees and commissions in recent months, and expressed the belief that:

"The essence of good human relations lies in the search, within each community, for laws and practices mutually satisfying to all its residents.

"We believe that the South, and each community of it, and the nation to which they all belong, must take an interest in the welfare and the development of each individual. . . ."

The policy statement also spelled out what it called the two "just demands" which form the main thrust of the so-called Negro revolt.

"One is that there be an end now to all forms of institutionalized segregation and discrimination: on this there can be no viable compromise.

"THE OTHER is that affirmative measures be adopted to integrate Negroes and other minorities into free participation in the nation's public life and economy."

The council said that despite all the turmoil (it called 1963 "a year . . . of unprecedented anxiety and disorder and tragedy") there is some cause for hope. The statement declared that:

"White Southerners are manifesting a new and quickened understanding of the political and economic dependence of the South's peoples on one another, and, above all, of their moral interdependence."

The council's statement also predicted that "as today's immediate challenge is civil rights, so tomorrow's will be full integration."

BINGHAMTON, N. Y.
SUN-BULLETIN
D. 30,100

DEC 30 1963

Southern Council advises Negroes to seek to vote

Washington Post Service

WASHINGTON — The greatest contribution that Negro Southerners can make to the nation's welfare and their own is to register and vote, in the opinion of the Southern Regional Council.

Negro voters, together with white Southerners, should aim toward establishing a truly representative government in the South and thus strengthen the leadership of that area, the council says.

The council's advice was contained in a year-end assessment of the racial situation issued yesterday by its executive committee.

The Southern Regional Council, with headquarters in Atlanta, is a venerable biracial organization working for equal opportunity for all Southerners, regardless of race.

The council statement characterized the racial situation today as one of "turmoil, but also of hope."

Negro Southerners, it said, have held to their faith in American institutions and fair play rather than being tempted by black supremacists, or violent reprisal or the Communist conspiracy.

White Southerners do not have such an admirable record, the council said. But it added:

"Today, however, white Southerners are manifesting a new and quickened understanding of the political and economic dependence of the South's peoples on one another, and above all, of their moral interdependence."

★ ★ ★

The present two issues of greatest urgency to domestic strength and tranquility, the council said, are 1) the uses of law and public policy to undo past wrongs, and 2) the right and propriety of protest demonstrations to speed the process.

Voluntary solutions to race problems should always be sought, the council said, but the failure of local and state governments to take action to solve the problems makes strong federal action necessary.

It said that federal leadership to curtail unemployment and equalize educational opportunities is necessary.

"Job scarcity has become an omnipresent motive for demonstrations," the council said, "and may predictably engender more and bitter protest."

ATLANTA, GA.
WORLD
D. 29,800

PAGE ONE (N)
CERTIFIED

DEC 31 1963

Negro Rejects Communism, In Rights Revolt---SRC

"Negro Americans generally, in their long struggle against injustice have steadfastly rejected the world-wide communist conspiracy" and "have held to their faith in American institutions," according to a statement released to the press by the Southern Regional Council.

The SRC, an organization designed to "attain the ideals and practices" of equal opportunity for all peoples in the South, also stated that "white Southerners have a much inferior record of loyalty to the principles of America and of the Judeo-Christian religion."

"The South's history for centuries has been intertwined with the travail of racial unrest and injustice. This injustice has been condoned and shared by the other sections of the United States and, indeed, has been part of the common practice of the European-American world," the year-ending statement charged.

WHITE SOUTHERNERS

Contrasting the Negro Americans faith in his country with the loyalty of the white man to the United States, the Southern Regional Council said: "They (whites) have been subverated in great numbers by bodies such as the Ku Klux Klan and the White Citizens Councils, which are a corruption of all that American ideals proclaim.

"Even worse, they have in yet larger numbers surrendered to those social and economic desires and conveniences which blunt the moral sensitivity of men and women toward their neighbors."

"Voluntary solutions to cure racial inequities should always be sought diligently by both white and Negro leaders," the SRC said "we think there is a clear necessity for legislative and executive actions by the local, state, and federal governments. Under our system of federalism, most of the issues of civil rights and race relations could be settled by action of local and state governments."

TWO JUST DEMANDS

The executive committee of the Southern Regional Council further stated:

"We need to recognize fully and clearly the two just demands of what is called the "Negro revolt." One is that there be an end NOW to all forms of institutionalized segregation and discrimination; on this there can be no viable compromise.

"The other is that affirmative measures be adopted to integrate Negroes and other minorities into free participation in the nation's public life and economy.

"Again we indicate our belief that vital problems of race relations could be well settled by state and local communities. We commend those southern cities which in recent months have established effective bi-racial commissions and committees. We believe that the essence of good human relations lies in the search, within each community, for laws and practices mutually satisfying to all its residents. We believe that the South, and each community of it, and the nation to which they all belong, must take an interest in the welfare and the development of each individual, and that only

(Continued on Page 6, Col. 1)

Negro Rejects

(Continued From Page One)

[illegible] so will it itself prosper. [illegible] of the issues of civil rights [illegible] be solved fully whle [illegible] throughout the popu- [illegible] present wide different- [illegible] educational opportunities, [illegible] unemployment is as large [illegible] as it is and has [illegible] are gratified by the in- [illegible] even imaginative, en- [illegible] now under way or being [illegible] in several southern states [illegible] educational levels. But fed- [illegible] leadership in these intricately related fields of education and employment is a continuing necessity. The current rate of unemployment is not only an economic drag but frustrates even sincere governmental and private efforts to overcome racial discrimination. Job scarcity has become an omnipresent motive for demonstrations, and may predictably engender more and bitteer protest.

PROTEST MOVEMENT

"There is no virtue per se in street demonstrations, but only the self-blinded fail to see the grandeur of the protest movement which since early 1960 has surged through the South.

"Through this movement Negroes seek no rights or privileges for themselves alone. They seek only those belonging to all American citizens. A wise society would encourage and applaud this discontent with inferior status, especially as its end result is to make more secure the rights of all.

"Demonstrations are a direct reaction to the failure or the laggardness of white leadership. The public leaders of the South have it in their power at any time to stop demonstrations by satisfying the demands of the federal Constitution, of justice and of religion.

"We are little impressed by public opinion polls which reveal Negro bitterness or white prejudice. No informed and intelligent observer has ever doubted the existence of either.

Bitterness and prejudice are now, as they have always been, the conditions against which the responsible institutions of American society — governments, churches, press, educational and professional institutions, business corporations — must contend and which they must rectify."

Chattanooga Daily Times
CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
D. 52,218 S. 82,245

DEC 30 1963

COUNCIL APPEALS TO DIXIE LEADERS

Says South Must Bolster Those Responsible for Attitudes

Special to The Chattanooga Times

ATLANTA — A South in which Negro and white citizens together exercise the ballot responsibly to bring about the democratization of the region's public life would be the greatest contribution to the national welfare at this stage in history, the Southern Regional Council declared Sunday.

For the overriding need is still to strengthen the leadership of the South, the council added, and to channel the two races' commonly held qualities of patience, forbearance, faith in human decency, intellectual and moral power into politics, schools, churches, business and other vital areas of the social fabric.

It is in this context, the council continued, that it would ask for national understanding and compassion for "those white Southerners who, because of the teaching and example of their civic leaders, perpetuate violence and spread malice.

"We would remind our fellow Southerners," the council stressed, "that as the record clearly shows, the bombers, the killers, the haters never act except in areas where they are tolerated by official and community attitudes. We come back, therefore, to the need for strengthening the leadership of the South.

Reaction to Failure

"Demonstrations are a direct reaction to the failure or tne laggardness of white leadership.

"The public leaders of the South have it in their power at any time to stop demonstrations by satisfying the demands of the federal Constitution, of justice and of religion."

In recognition of the importance of leadership in this setting, the council said that it commended "those Negro and white citizens who, through lawful assembly, peaceful picketing and other forms of orderly demonstrations have used the methods of democracy to advance human rights."

"We commend their leaders, who have constantly taught that demonstrations must be nonviolent, in spirit as well as in form," the council said.

The council also noted that street demonstrations carry no virtue in themselves, but warned that "only the self-blinded fail to see the grandeur of the protest movement which since early 1960 has surged through the South.

"Through this movement," the council said, "Negroes seek no rights or privileges for themselves alone. They seek only those belonging to all American citizens.

killers, the haters never act except in areas where they are tolerated by official and community attitudes. We come back, therefore, to the need for strengthening the leadership of the South.

Reaction to Failure

"Demonstrations are a direct reaction to the failure or the laggardness of white leadership.

"The public leaders of the South have it in their power at any time to stop demonstrations by satisfying the demands of the federal Constitution, of justice and of religion."

In recognition of the importance of leadership in this setting, the council said that it commended "those Negro and white citizens who, through lawful assembly, peaceful picketing and other forms of orderly demonstrations have used the methods of democracy to advance human rights."

"We commend their leaders, who have constantly taught that demonstrations must be nonviolent, in spirit as well as in form," the council said.

The council also noted that street demonstrations carry no virtue in themselves, but warned that "only the self-blinded fail to see the grandeur of the protest movement which since early 1960 has surged through the South.

"Through this movement," the council said, "Negroes seek no rights or privileges for themselves alone. They seek only those belonging to all American citizens.

"A wise society would encourage this discontent with inferior status, especially as its end result is to make more secure the rights of all."

The council also commended those Southern cities which in recent months have established effective biracial commissions and committees. It added its conviction that the "essence of good human relations lies in the search within each community for law and practices mutually satisfying to all its residents."

The council said it believed the increased concern of the federal government in civil rights matters and the leadership of President Kennedy and the announced resolve of President Johnson to continue this leadership "has done much good."

Problem Is Local

It added, however, that the federal government does not satisfy the public well when it treats symptoms and not the problems, "when it merely palliates disorders and leaves them to fester and nag at the nerves of the people."

Consequently, the council said, the vital problems of race relations "can be well settled by state and local communities" when the leadership is strong and dedicated to democratic ideals.

"Under our system of federalism," the council noted, "most of the issues of civil rights and race relations could be settled by action of local and state governments. Only their failure to do so has caused the federal government to intervene and continues to make strong federal action necessary, because the condition of our constitutional rights and of our race relations is a national burden and disgrace."

In this sense, the council added, Negroes in this country overridingly have rejected the voices of those who urge them to get behind a wall of hate toward whites or to the blandishments of the world-wide Communist conspiracy.

Rather, the council said, the Negro segment has held to its faith in American institutions, while many white Southerners have had "an inferior record of loyalty to the principles of America and the Judeo-Christian religion," allowing themselves to be "subverted" by the Ku Klux Klan and other white supremacy groups who blunt the moral sensitivity of men and women toward their neighbors.

Even so, the council declared, white Southerners are now showing "a quickened understanding" of the political, economic and moral interdependence of all of the peoples of the region, and with good leadership the South can make a positive contribution to the nation and to mankind.

The council is widely recognized as the region's foremost interracial organization working for equal opportunity and improvements.

Members of the council's ex-

AUGUSTA, GA.
HERALD
D. 20,779

DEC 30 1963

Integrationist Group Lists Two Demands

By United Press International

The Southern Regional Council today boiled the so-called Negro revolt of 1963 down to a matter of two "just demands."

"One is that there be an end now to all forms of institutionized segregation and discrimination; on this there can be no visible compromise.

"The other is that affirmative measures be adopted to integrate Negroes and other minorities into free participation in the naton's public life and economy."

A newly - enlarged bi-racial committee meets in Sanford, N. C. tonight and its action will probably decide whether mass racial demonstrations resume in the Lee County town.

Some 126 arrests were made in Sanford Friday during demonstrations at four all-white restaurants and a Negro teen-age girl charged that she was shot in the leg.

Sanford police, however, said they have been unable to find evidence that a gun was fired during the demonstration at Matthews restaurant.

The Negroes called a breathing spell Saturday to give the new bi-racial committee an opportunity to meet tonight.

Meanwhile, in Chapel Hill, N. C., 15 civil rights demonstrators, including five juveniles, were arrested Sunday evening during a sit-in at the Pines restaurant.

The arrest brought to more than 200 the number of persons taken into custody during racial protests in the University town since Dec. 13.

An imprisoned white integrationist, Patrick Cusick, 30, of Chapel Hill, ended a 14-day hunger strike Saturday after he was transferred from a segregated prison unit in Durham County to an integrated unit.

Arkansas Gazette
LITTLE ROCK, ARK.
D. 92,176 S. 105,024

DEC 30 1963

Race Council Will Honor Cartwrights

Dr. Leslie W. Dunbar of Baltimore, executive director of the Southern Regional Council, will discuss progress in race relations at the annual meeting of the Arkansas Council on Human Relations Saturday at the Grady Manning Hotel.

The Concil's Board of Directors and its Advisory Council also will meet that day. The Time-Life film "Lillian Smith of Georgia" will be shown in the afternoon.

The Council will honor Rev. and Mrs. Colbert S. Cartwright at a reception at the Baptist Student Union at 323 South Elm Street at 8 p. m. Saturday. Mr. Cartwright, pastor of Pulaski Heights Christian Church and a member of the Council Board of Directors, is leaving Little Rock to take a pastorate at Youngstown, O.

Dunbar, a native of Virginia, received his doctor of philosophy degree from Cornell University and later taught there and at Smith College, Mount Holyoke College and Emory University. He also worked for the Atomic Energy Commission before going to the Southern Regional Council as director of research in 1959. He was named executive director in 1961.

LESLIE W. DUNBAR
To Speak to Council

DAILY
Chicago Defender
(WORLD'S GREATEST WEEKLY)
D. 22,249

DEC 31 1963

Council Tells Negro Goals

ATLANTA — (UPI) — The Southern Regional Council has boiled the Negro Revolt of 1963 down to a matter of two "just demands."

"One is that there be an end to all forms of institutionized segregation and discrimination; on this there can be no viable compromise.

"The other is that affirmative measures be adopted to integrate Negroes and other minorities into free participation in the nation's public life and economy."

The council, which describes itself as an organization to attain the ideals and practices of equal opportunity for all peoples in the South, explained the demands in an end of the year statement made through its executive committee.

Vol. II – No. 5 December, 1963

YOUR CLIPPING ANALYST

How to Secure More Clippings and Use Them More Profitably

Publisher: Arthur V. Wynne, Jr. Editor: Will Schoyer

BURRELLE'S PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU, 165 CHURCH ST., NEW YORK 7, N. Y. BARCLAY 7-5371

No. 3 - The Over 100 Club

YES, VIRGINIA, SANTA CLAUS CAN VISIT MOSCOW AND LAND ON FRONT PAGES AT THE SAME TIME

But as in the Famous Editorial, There's A Twist to the Story

This article continues our series on public relations stories that passed the high water-mark of more than 100 placements.

"The idea came to us out of the blue one Saturday morning while we were waiting to tee off in a golf match," writes William Gober of William Gober Public Relations Associates, Jacksonville, Florida. Soon quite a few Americans were reading about it under the slogan (now copyrighted) of "Candy for Moscow."

The idea was for Gober's client, Candymaker Robert I. Horne, to make a Christmas gift of candy to the children of Moscow, Russia, in the name of the children of America. Horne, like Gober, was enthusiastic; both believed the project would have genuine value as a gesture of international goodwill.

Gober Associates laid careful groundwork, working through Rep. Charles E. Bennett (D-Fla.) and the State Department to secure official authorization, and get the plan rolling. Novelist Dr. Frank G. Slaughter was commissioned to write a Christmas message, which was translated into Russian by the University of Florida. This was included in each of 5,000 pound boxes of candy which Horne made up for shipment.

The project was unveiled to the press on November 10 of last year. The AP story, used

(Continued on Page 4)

Candymaker Bob Horne, his Christmas Candy for Russian children packaged, awaits word that never came from the first Moscow.

MULTILITHED CLIPPING MONTAGE GAINS POPULARITY AS ECONOMICAL WAY TO CAPITALIZE ON PUBLICITY

F. J. Stokes Corp., Pratt Institute, Use It To 'Play Back' News

The economy and availability of offset printing, often within offices, is increasing the use of multilithed clipping montages, as an effective means of internal (and to a lesser degree external) news communication.

Simplicity is the outstanding virtue of such "publications." Clippings are simply pasted up in a rough layout, a plate made, and the required copies multilithed. A single sheet is often used, sometimes printed on both sides. Two effective examples are described below.

Stokes in the News

Victor N. Musmanno, manager of market development for F. J. Stokes Corp., manufacturer of process machines for a variety of industries, edits and distributes the simple but multiple-value "publication" called STOKES IN THE NEWS. Frederick R. Brewster of Ellington & Company, Stokes PR counsel, assisted in its development.

Clippings are arranged in a loose, informal layout, or a full length article is used, the sheet being printed on both sides. It is issued once a month to Stokes executives, department heads, and the field representatives who each receive a small quantity for their own distribution.

Particularly the field salesmen (some of whom are manufacturers reps, the rest Company men with a wide range of products) need to be reminded periodically that the Company's activities are really news-worthy. They also use the NEWS as a sales tool – a door-opener, follow-up mailing, or "leave-with" literature.

STOKES . . . IN THE NEWS

A few clippings of an article on Food Freeze Drying recently released by Associated Press . . .

Freeze-Drying Is Called 'Hottest Thing' in Foods

Little-Known New Preservation Process Needs No Refrigeration After Sealing

PHILADELPHIA (AP) — Fancy reaching into the pantry to get a month-old omelet for dinner. Or steak. Or codfish. Or almost any food. It might have been sitting there at room temperature for a long time, but thanks to a new food process, it could be served up hot on the plate without the eater guessing its history.

The process it called freeze-drying, the hottest thing, say some experts in the food industry.

Soup Mixes Offered

So little is known about it outside the trade that last November, when the Campbell Soup Co. introduced six freeze-dried soup mixes in the Philadelphia market, it sought to explain as well as sell the new product.

As Campbell put it:

"With new freeze-drying, the food is first frozen, and then it is dried in a vacuum so the moisture is taken away not as water, but as vapor. That leaves almost all the natural flavor in the food."

A steak so processed looks like a stiff sponge. Put in boiling water, its color and texture returns.

It's the same process used for years preserving medicines and blood plasma.

FOR FOOD, it offers distinct advantages. With up to 98 per cent of the water removed, foods weigh less than one-fourth of their fresh weight. No refrigeration is required once the product — cooked or raw — is sealed hermetically.

But in consumer foods freeze-drying is both new and revolutionary. And, says Frank R. Lawler of Food Engineering, although it is barely beyond the joint stage as a worldwide process it is "a highly significant development and it is coming."

The Danforth-Epply Corp. of Wellesley Hills, Mass., said in a recent advisory to investors it will take time to educate the public to accept freeze-dried products.

"Nevertheless," the report says, "the major food companies are showing interest in the new high processing system. It's possible that during the 1960s freeze-dried foods will build up the same rapid growth that frozen foods scored during the 1950s — and sales of freeze-dried foods could reach $1 billion by 1970."

Armour provided explorer Sir Edmund Hillary with some 300 pounds of freeze-dried ham, chicken, steaks, chops, fruits and vegetables for one of his Himalayan expeditions. The products, when reconstituted weighed some 1200 pounds.

In the armed forces, which now must be more mobile than ever, freeze-dried foods are regarded as a logistics godsend.

The Quartermaster Food and Container Institute for the Armed Forces last year demonstrated a 1200-calorie meal of meatball's, mashed potatoes, green peas, peaches, coffee and salted peanuts which "taste-testers called delicious. Such meals can be served hot to the GI curled in the middle of nowhere on maneuvers or at the combat front. (Yes, the Army's kit contains directions for boiling water.)

THE INSTITUTE SAYS its quick-serve meals will be field-tested for at least one year before becoming government issue.

American pioneers are two food equipment makers — the Food Machinery and Chemical Corp. of San Jose, Calif., and the F. J. Stokes Corp. in Philadelphia.

John F. Maguire, manager of Stokes' vacuum process division, says, "Contrary to the usual sequence whereby equipment development follows process development, freeze-drying equipment for economical production of tonnage quantities of highest quality foods is available today.

"We have only scratched the surface. The consumer market for these foods is waiting to be developed," he said.

Large food firms entering or researching freeze-drying include Wilson & Co., General Foods, General Mills, H. J. Heinz, United Fruit Co., Armour & Co., Libby, McNeill & Libby, Stokely Van Camp, Swift & Co., Corn Products Co., and Thomas J. Lipton.

810 The Springfield
Springfield, Mass. Union (m)
(S)
MAR 5 1962

THAT FORECAST is challenging. Lawler says, "But in view of current developments and potential markets, it may not be impossible" for says it would call for a four billion-pound annual output by the end of the decade and by comparison he notes that frozen foods reached the 6½ billion-pound level in 30 years, starting in the 1930s.

Why all the hoo about a new process when fresh food now is available at the grocery the year-around, frozen, concentrated and canned products abound, convenience foods already take the cook out of cooking?

For food freeze-drying has some distinct advantages — among them, lower costs in transportation and storage; long shelf life and convenience your grandmother never dreamed of as a girl.

Shrimp from the Gulf of Mexico can be pre-cooked and freeze-dried, shipped to the Midwest and East and sold for less than frozen shrimp. Once delivered, they are stored with dry goods, taking up less shelf space than cans.

* * *

ARMOUR & CO., which began supplying freeze-dried chicken chunks and other foods to the Army months ago, has pioneered a line of convenience foods for outdoorsmen as well as the military. This includes freeze-dried steaks, beef and chicken stews and cooked scrambled eggs requiring five to 20 minutes to prepare.

830 The Detroit Free Press
Detroit, Mich. (m) 573,000
(S) 622,000
MAR 5 1962

The Pioneers . . .

American pioneers are two food equipment makers —the Food Machinery and Chemical Corp. of San Jose, Calif., and the F. J. Stokes Corp. in Philadelphia.

John F. Maguire, manager of Stokes' vacuum process division, says "We have only scratched the surface. The consumer market for these foods is waiting to be developed."

Large food firms entering or researching freeze-drying include Wilson & Co., Campbell Soup Co., General Foods, General Mills, H. J. Heinz, United Fruit Co., Armour & Co., Libby, McNeill & Libby, Stokely Van Camp, Swift & Co., Corn Products Co. and Thomas J. Lipton Co.

269 San Jose News
San Jose, Calif. (e)
(S)
MAR 6 1962

New Food Processing

FMC Corp. and the F. J. Stokes Corp. of Philadelphia are working on a new process by which food can be preserved indefinitely without refrigeration. Called freeze-drying, it involves dehydration of foods after freezing. A steak processed like this looks like a stiff sponge. Drop it into boiling water and it comes out a delicious steak again.

Throughout the Company and with prospects, the bulletin supplements the impression created by the original publicity, or makes up for news not seen by the busy reader. Posted on plant bulletin boards it stimulates employee morale. Its readership is such that if, because of pressure of other work, Musmanno falls behind in issuing SITN, he immediately hears of it.

Pratt in the News

Robert I. Queen, director of information services, Pratt Institute, author and former radio-TV director, tells of his clipping information program with photos. Below, Mr. Queen, left, reviews clippings fresh from their envelopes with Bart J. DeVito, chief photographer.

"By keeping faculty and students well informed through these procedures," Queen concludes, "we support one of our basic policies: That good public relations begins within the college."

As a first step in informing Institute personnel, Queen and DeVito mount publicity on a bulletin board (next column). Some clippings are then photographed for multiple distribution or posting, as exemplified by large sheet, center of board.

Others are more formally published in PRATT IN THE NEWS. Laid out more closely and on a larger sheet (reduced in reproduction) than the Stokes product, this provides more information at a reading. It also is imprinted both sides. It goes to the Pratt staff and, where a story can be used to aid the Office of Administration, is distributed to outside guidance counselors.

PRATT IN THE NEWS

Photographic View Of Pratt's 75 Years

PRATT INSTITUTE MARKS 75TH YEAR

Little Red Schoolhouse an Educational Giant

Architecture-Planning Program Offered By Pratt In September

Former UF faculty member assistant dean at Pratt

Pratt Dean's Fashion Career Started at the Sewing Machine

Pratt Art Students Sound Off

Automation Gets Foot in Homework

That Noise Isn't Music — It's Art —

The Over 100 Club

(Continued from Page 1)

with heads such as: "He Wants To Play Santa Claus to Soviet Children," led:

"Businessman Bob Horne has asked the State Department for clearance to fly to Moscow with 5,000 pounds of goodies to play Santa Claus to some Soviet children. He said he merely wants to show how American children celebrate Christmas."

Nothing now remained but Russian permission for the trip. Days passed, but while no "Nyet" was received, neither was any okay.

Translation of Russian Text

A CHRISTMAS MESSAGE

In the United States, the Christmas Season is traditionally a time when we share with others the good things that have come to us during the year. Children hang up stockings and shout with pleased laughter when they find them filled on Christmas morning. The more fortunate give of their substance to those less favored. Most of all, however, Americans give thanks at Christmas for peace and what it brings. To the children of Russia, those of America send these gifts at Christmastime as tokens of their earnest wish that peace and goodwill shall continue between all the peoples of the earth.

When, by December 16, Soviet silence still prevailed, and time was running out, Gober activated the alternative he had prepared for such a situation. He arranged, through Mayor Fred W. Handel of Moscow, Idaho, for the candy to go to school children there.

"The kids got quite a lift out of the Russian message," he commented.

The press, too, thought the switch worth a second go-around. When the clippings from the double release were in, 248 news stories and editorials had publicized it. The wire services carried both stories. Many appeared on front pages. Coverage was obtained in leading papers throughout the country. Editorial writers lauded Mr. Horne's friendly gesture.

William Gober

Children, Christmas, a warm people-to-people appeal directed across the cold-war frontier — Gober's project had combined all these solid news interests. Planned carefully but simply, and executed with good taste, it legitimately cracked the 100 clipping barrier.

Incidentally, Horne and Gober plan to try for Soviet Moscow again, hopefully next year if tensions have eased.

BURRELLE'S SALES OFFICES:

14 E. Jackson Blvd.	1456 N. Crescent Hgts. Blvd.	304 Ross Street	734 15th Street N.W.
Chicago 4, Ill.	Hollywood 46, Calif.	Pittsburgh 19, Pa.	Washington 5, D.C.
WAbash 2-5371	OLdfield 6-0304	GRant 1-9411	EXecutive 3-5371

Production Office: 75-89 E. Northfield Ave., Livingston, N. J. WYman 2-6600

CLARKSDALE, MISS.
PRESS REGISTER
D. 5,290

JAN 1 1964

Goals Cited

Negro Group Says Race Issue Involves Only Two 'Just Demands'

ATLANTA (UPI)—The Southern Regional Council Saturday boiled the so - called Negro revolt of 1963 down to a matter of two "just demands."

"One is that there be an end now to all forms of institutionized segregation and discrimination; on this there can be no viable compromise.

"The other is that affirmative measures be adopted to integrate Negroes and other minorities into free participation in the nation's public life and economy."

The council, which describes itself as an organization to attain the ideals and practices of equal opportunity for all peoples in the South, explained the demands in an end of the year statement made through its executive committee. The council makes its headquarters in Atlanta.

Call for Action

The statement called for legislative and executive actions by the local, state and federal governments to see demands turned into reality.

"Under our system of federalism, most of the issues of civil rights and race relations could be settled by action of local and state governments." the statement said.

"Only their failure to do so has caused the federal government to intervene and continues to make strong federal action necessary, because the condition of our constitutional rights and of our race relations is a national burden and disgrace.

"In this connection, we take great encouragement from those federal court decisions and those state enactments which are ending to some extent the vicious and undemocratic apportionment of seats in our legislatures and in Congress. There is good reason to hope that as urban centers of the South are accorded their fair representation, and government thereby becomes responsive to majority opinion and needs, a new and more responsible politics will grow up in the South.

Increase of Concern

"The increase of federal concern and activity in recent years had done much good. America is a better land because of the brilliant thrust of President John Fitzgerald Kennedy's moral and political leading and because of President Johnson's resolve to 'move forward to eliminate from this nation every trace of discrimination and oppression.' "

The statement said the council commends "those Negro and white citizens who, through lawful assembly, peaceful picketing, and other forms of orderly demonstrations have used the methods of democracy to advance human rights."

It also said it asks the nation's understanding of and compassion for those white Southerners who, because of the teaching and example of their civic leaders, perpetuate violence and spread malice.

"We would remind our fellow Southerners that, as the record clearly shows, the bombers, the killers, the haters never act except in areas where they are tolerated by official and community attitudes."

The Atlanta Journal
"COVERS DIXIE LIKE THE DEW"
D. 259,003

JAN 4 1964

THE JOURNAL FORUM

Negro Hope Seen in Protest

Faith in U.S. Institutions Called Guide to Race Action

The South's history for centuries has been intertwined with the travail of racial unrest and injustice.

This injustice has been condoned and shared by the other sections of the United States and, indeed, has been part of the common practice of the European-American world.

There is nowhere we can turn that the infection of racial prejudice and discrimination has not spread.

These are days of turmoil, but also of hope. Negro Southerners, and Negro Americans generally, in their long struggle against injustice have steadfastly rejected the self-defeating temptations of those who proclaim that Negroes should segregate themselves from whites behind their own wall of hatred; of those who have advocated organized violent reprisal against white men; and of those who by insidious teaching and tactics have urged Negro Americans

About the Forum Writers

This statement was issued by the executive committee of the Southern Regional Council, which has headquarters in Atlanta. The council's president is James McBride Dabbs, a planter who lives at Mayesville, S.C. Georgia members of the executive committee are Dr. Rufus E.

War II is evidenced by the fact that the present two issues of greatest urgency to our domestic strength and tranquility are the uses of law and public policy to undo the wrongs of the past, and the right and propriety of protest demonstrations to speed this process.

As to the first issue, and while recommending that voluntary solutions to cure racial inequities should always be sought diligently by both white and Negro leaders, we think there is a clear necessity for legislative and executive actions by the local, state and federal governments.

We are not, in the South or in the country as a whole, starting from scratch; we have an enormous housecleaning and rebuilding job, and governmental power should be employed for this public service.

Under our system of federalism, most of the issues of civil rights and race relations could be settled by action of local and state governments.

Only their failure to do so has caused the federal gov-

You will find on this page a thoughtful discussion of current news and opinion. Today's Forum presents a rare formal statement of views and policy by the Southern Regional employment is a continuing necessity.

The current rate of unemployment is not only an economic drag but frustrates even sincere governmental and private efforts to overcome racial discrimination. Job scarcity has become an omnipresent motive for demonstrations, and may predictably engender more and bitter protest.

We believe that the South, difficult as are its present problems and unhappy as its history has been, can, nevertheless, make a new social life that is richly humane, because it will have grown out of the honestly faced and concrete necessities of a common life.

As today's immediate challenge is civil rights, so tomorrow's will be full integration tion, of justice and of religion.

We are little impressed by public opinion polls which reveal Negro bitterness or white prejudice. No informed and intelligent observer has ever doubted the existence of either.

BITTERNESS and prejudice are now, as they have always been, the conditions against which the responsible institutions of American society — governments, churches, press, educational and professional institutions, business corporations — must contend and which they must rectify.

We would remind our fellow Southerners that, as the record clearly shows, the bombers, the killers, the haters never act except in areas where they are tolerated by official and have urged Negro Americans

About the Forum Writers

This statement was issued by the executive committee of the Southern Regional Council, which has headquarters in Atlanta. The council's president is James McBride Dabbs, a planter who lives at Mayesville, S.C. Georgia members of the executive committee are Dr. Rufus E. Clement, Mrs. Grace T. Hamilton, Joseph F. Haas and Josephine Wilkins.

to join the ranks of the worldwide Communist conspiracy against constitutional democracy.

They have, on the contrary, held to their faith in American institutions and to the inextinguishable instinct of men to deal fairly and honorably with each other.

WHITE Southerners have a much inferior record of loyalty to the principles of America and of the Judeo-Christian religion. They have been subverted in great numbers by bodies such as the Ku Klux Klan and the White Citizens Councils, which are a corruption of all that American ideals proclaim.

Today, however, white Southerners are manifesting a new and a quickened understanding of the political and economic dependence of the South's peoples on one another, and, above all, of their moral interdependence. . . .

In the past, and most especially during the last 80 years or so, the South has deliberately created laws and public policies to keep its two races apart and to discriminate against its Negro citizens.

At the same time, Southern political leaders contended that law can never be used to bring the two races together or to suppress discrimination. They had thus effectively removed from Negro Southerners every power and privilege of protest, except the privilege of leaving family and neighbors by moving to the North or West.

THAT WE have progressed far in the years since World and Negro leaders, we think there is a clear necessity for legislative and executive actions by the local, state and federal governments.

We are not, in the South or in the country as a whole, starting from scratch; we have an enormous housecleaning and rebuilding job, and governmental power should be employed for this public service.

Under our system of federalism, most of the issues of civil rights and race relations could be settled by action of local and state governments.

Only their failure to do so has caused the federal government to intervene and continues to make strong federal action necessary, because the condition of our constitutional rights and of our race relations is a national burden and disgrace.

IN THIS connection, we take great encouragement from those federal court decisions and those state enactments which are ending to some extent the vicious and undemocratic apportionment of seats in our legislatures and in Congress.

There is good reason to hope that, as urban centers of the South are accorded their fair representation, and government thereby becomes responsive to majority opinion and needs, a new and more responsible politics will grow up in the South. . . .

We need to recognize fully and clearly the two just demands of what is called the "Negro revolt."

One is that there be an end now to all forms of institutionalized segregation and discrimination; on this there can be no viable compromise.

The other is that affirmative measures be adopted to integrate Negroes and other minorities into free participation in the nation's public life and economy.

The federal government does not serve the public well when the help it offers, through either legislative or executive actions, is minimal; when it treats symptoms and not the problems; when it merely palliates disorders, leaving them to fester and to nag at the nerves of the people; or when it allows its money to be spent in ways that perpetuate or strengthen discrimination against the welfare or dignity of any class of citizens.

Again we indicate our belief that vital problems of race relations could be well settled by state and local communities. We commend those Southern cities which in recent months have established effective biracial commissions and committees.

You will find on this page a thoughtful discussion of current news and opinion. Today's Forum presents a rare formal statement of views and policy by the Southern Regional Council, an agency whose work in race relations makes its positions a subject of public interest. The Forum soon will present some of Sen. Herman Talmadge's views on civil rights subjects.

We are gratified by the industrious, even imaginative, endeavors now under way or being discussed in several Southern states to lift educational levels. But federal leadership in these intricately related fields of education and sincere governmental and private efforts to overcome racial discrimination. Job scarcity has become an omnipresent motive for demonstrations, and may predictably engender more and bitter protest.

We believe that the South, difficult as are its present problems and unhappy as its history has been, can, nevertheless, make a new social life that is richly humane, because it will have grown out of the honestly faced and concrete necessities of a common life.

As today's immediate challenge is civil rights, so tomorrow's will be full integration. . . .

THE MEANS to this end is a thoroughly democratic, thoroughly responsible politics.

There is no virtue per se in street demonstrations, but only the self - blinded fail to see the grandeur of the protest movement which since early 1960 has surged through the South.

Through this movement Negroes seek no rights or privileges for themselves alone. They seek only those belonging to all American citizens. A wise society would encourage and applaud this discontent with inferior status, especially as its end result is to make more secure the rights of all.

Demonstrations are a direct reaction to the failure or the laggardness of white leadership. The public leaders of the South have it in their power at any time to stop demonstrations by satisfying the demands of the federal Constitu- and intelligent observer has ever doubted the existence of either.

BITTERNESS and prejudice are now, as they have always been, the conditions against which the responsible institutions of American society — governments, churches, press, educational and professional institutions, business corporations — must contend and which they must rectify.

We would remind our fellow Southerners that, as the record clearly shows, the bombers, the killers, the haters never act except in areas where they are tolerated by official and community attitudes.

We come back, therefore, to the need for strengthening the leadership of the South. Because we believe profoundly in democracy, we think that democratization of Southern public life is the pathway to strength.

We believe that the greatest contribution which Negro Southerners can make today to the national welfare and to their own is to register and to vote responsibly, and, together with white citizens, to establish truly representative government in the South. . . .

The Atlanta Journal (evening), The Atlanta Constitution (morning), and The Atlanta Journal and The Atlanta Constitution (Sunday) published by Atlanta Newspapers, Inc., 10 Forsyth Street, Atlanta, Georgia.

Issued Sunday and New Year's Day, July 4th, Labor Day, Thanksgiving and Christmas. Second-class postage paid at Atlanta, Georgia.

Home-delivered subscription prices: Morning and Sunday or Evening and Sunday, 1 week, 50c. Morning or evening, daily only, 1 week, 30c. Morning, Evening and Sunday (13 issues), 1 week, 80c. Single copies, Daily, 5c; Sunday, 20c. Plus 3% sales tax on sales and deliveries made within the State of Georgia. Subscription prices by mail on request.

ARKANSAS DEMOCRAT
LITTLE ROCK, ARK.
D. 84,691 S. 103,346

JAN 5 1964

Democrat Photo by Gunter

DUNBAR GREETED BY REV. AND MRS. CARTWRIGHT
. . . At annual meeting of Arkansas Human Relations Council

Race Issue Called Nation's Most Vital Domestic Problem

By L. D. KERR
Democrat Staff Writer

The American people's disrespect for Congress will increase unless the nation's lawmakers step into the "legislative vacuum" and do something about civil rights for Negroes, the executive director of the Southern Regional Council said yesterday.

Dr. Leslie W. Dunbar of Atlanta spoke of the pending civil rights legislation as a vital need toward solving America's racial problem—"our most important domestic problem."

"It is an unhealthy situation for the legislative branch of our federal government to remain inactive for so long," he said during an interview at the Grady Manning Hotel. Dunbar was at the hotel for the noon session of the annual meeting of the Arkansas Council on Human Relations.

He said, "You cannot overemphasize the importance of Congress passing something (in the civil rights field) and passing it soon." He then spoke of the "steam built up" in 1963 by Negroes who demonstrated against conditions as they exist in the United States.

Dr. Dunbar said, "There is no way at all to maintain segregation and the American Constitution." He then added with tongue in cheek that such a situation could exist "so long as the Negroes acquiesce to segregation" or "tyrannical methods such as those of the Union of South Africa" were adopted.

There is tangible evidence in the southern states of North Carolina, Georgia and Kentucky that progress is being made in relations between the races, Dr. Dunbar asserted. In this connection he counted increased desegreration of schools and other public facilities, an upsurge in voter registrations and reapportionment to extend more voting equality.

There is "some awakening" of white churches in the South and indications of "statesmanship" in the problem of race relations, he said, adding that some public officials are no longer engaging in "nigger politics."

Dr. Dunbar said, "America means so much to us and to the world. This generation of Americans has the awful responsibility of saving it."

"The point I am making," he added, "Is that unless we resolve this race problem, and resolve it soon, we are going to do serious damage to constitutional liberties and the American institutions."

Dr. Dunbar, a native of West Virginia, received his doctor of philosophy degree from Cornell University and later taught there and at Smith College, Mount Holyoke College and Emory University. He was with the Atomic Energy Commission before going to the Southern Regional Council in 1959 as director of research. He was named executive director of the council in 1961.

The Arkansas Council on Human Relations honored Rev. and Mrs. Colbert S. Cartwright at a reception at the Baptist Student Union at 323 S. Elm last night. The Rev. Mr. Cartwright, pastor of Pulaski Heights Christian Church and a member of the council board of director, is leaving Little Rock Tuesday to become pastor of the Central Christian Church of Youngstown, Ohio.

The Atlanta Journal
"COVERS DIXIE LIKE THE DEW"
D. 259,003

JAN 1 1 1964

THE JOURNAL FORUM

Talmadge Examines Rights

Georgian Raps FEPC Bill, Talks North-South Relations

Q. Sen. Talmadge, sometime after the first of February, probably, the House will send over a civil rights bill to the Senate. Do you expect that the debate in the Senate will eventually generate a filibuster?

A. It will depend in the final analysis on what the so-called civil rights bill includes. Certainly, if it comes to the Senate in about its present form, it will precipitate a tremendous fight. There are many provisions of the bill that would change our republic as we know it, and substitute government action for the action of free citizens.

Q. Are you thinking mainly of the public accommodations section, for example?

A. I'm thinking primarily of the so-called FEPC provision that would put the government in the business of determining the employment of every employe and the rights of every employe and the rights of every business, affecting every citizen who would be employed in a private business, his promotion, his salary and everything about it.

In other words, it would . . . substitute the government for the action of an employe or an employer or a labor union in all fields of private employment where they had 25 employes or more. Now, that's only one of many drastic provisions of this bill.

One of the provisions authorizes cutting off all federal funds of any kind or character that may be applicable to loans or government appropriations or grants in whole counties, whole states, or entire regions, at the will of one man. I certainly wouldn't be in favor of that. . . .

There's a provision in there that could deprive whole states of representation in the Congress of the United States, certainly a reduction in the number of congressmen that they could have. Those are extremely vicious provisions.

Of course, human relations, man's relation to his fellow man, is largely a matter of the mind and the heart and conscience and it must be met by the free will of individuals, and cannot be made the matter of federal legislation unless you're going to have a police state with troops and bayonets to regulate the lives of the people, and I don't approve of that.

Q. What can we do to improve goodwill among men, Sen. Talmadge? I think that for a period of maybe 48 hours, immediately after the assassination, we all suddenly became men of goodwill, but then, perhaps, I think we went back to our sinful ways.

A. I think we're making tremendous strides in that field, Joe. The attitudes and mores of the people are changing to a great degree throughout the country. They're beginning to recognize an individual now with reference to his individual worth and not considering them as groups or classes, and I think that is as it should be.

If more human relations were promoted on the local level, I think segregation would solve itself much sooner than many people think. But, if we have conflicts and continued agitation and police state laws, I think it'll merely aggravate the situation rather than solve it.

Q. (A) former governor of Florida, LeRoy Collins, spoke in South Carolina in a speech that has caused quite a little comment throughout the South. One of the things he said was that anyone in the South looking into the future (who) can still see segregation (is) deluding themselves. What would be your thinking along that line?

A. Of course, we know that regardless of what the attitude of the people may be in any area of our country, when the full power of the federal government is brought to bear, the local people cannot withstand it.

And that is the reason I think local people should get together and consider their relations with their fellow man and solve it on the local level, rather than have oppressive, coercive legislation that would destroy really the freedom of all of our people in the process. . . .

Q. Do you think that Mr. Johnson as president . . . may do much to alleviate the imaginary curtain that hangs between North and South?

A. I would hope that would be the case. I have seen some of the ablest men in America passed completely by on the national political scene merely because they were Southerners.

Q. Mr. Johnson was in 1960.

A. Mr. Johnson was. As I pointed out earlier, he is one of the most able men I know, but he was almost completely vetoed in many areas of our country because they said he was a Southerner. Of course, I think the President claims to be a Westerner. But Texas is, in many circles, considered a Southern state. And that has been a tremendous handicap.

My own colleague, Sen. Russell, one of the most able men that I have ever known in public life . . . offered himself as a candidate to the Democratic convention in '48 and in '52, and he was vetoed because he came from the state of Georgia, and in former President Truman's book he said that if Dick Russell had lived in Indiana or Ohio he probably would have been president of the United States.

Q. This is a crystal ball question, Sen. Talmadge, and you can break the crystal if you want to. But, how do you think President Johnson will do in the South come November . . .?

A. Well, we can only tell the future by what the present situation is. I think President Johnson would carry the state of Georgia today by a very substantial majority, and I would anticipate that he would carry the overwhelming majority of the Southern states. Now, we don't know what might arise between now and November 1964 to alter the picture, but I'm telling you what the attitudes are today. . . .

Q. Has the death of Mr. Kennedy, do you think, weakened the Goldwater movement in the South?

A. Yes, I would think so. I think Goldwater strength in the South is to a very great degree because he was looked upon as the very antithesis of President Kennedy, and then he was personable, attractive, and I would think that we have an entirely new situation now with the new President and some new issues. And I would think that Sen. Goldwater is not as strong in the South now as he was prior to the President's unfortunate assassination.

About the Forum Writer

This forum is part of a television interview of Sen. Talmadge. The questions were asked by Joseph McCaffrey for WMAL-TV in Washington.

You will find on this page a thoughtful discussion of current news and opinion. Last week's forum presented a statement on racial views by the Southern Regional Council. This week some of Sen. Herman Talmadge's views on civil rights legislation and related matters are presented.

Rochester Times-Union
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
D. 128,773
JAN 25 1964

Atlanta Pickets Greet U.N. Unit

Atlanta (AP) — Negro pickets protesting segregation greeted members of a United Nations group dealing with racial discrimination during their first visit to the South.

The marchers carried signs reading "Atlanta Needs U.N. Help," and "Atlanta—Gateway to the Segregated South" and they sang "freedom songs" in the rain after the visitors arrived last night.

The picketing by the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee occurred at the airport and again outside the motel where the group was staying. No incidents were reported.

But the demonstration gave U.N. members from 10 countries—the Soviet Union included — a first-hand glimpse of racial problems at the very beginning of their two-day tour.

Lester Dunbar, head of the Southern Regional Council, was among the civil rights leaders and city officials who extended a formal welcome.

"In no other country has a revolution gone on under the protection of a constitution," he said, referring to the Negro campaign for equal rights.

"You will see people demonstrating their faith that Atlanta can be a better place than it is," he said.

• • •

HERNAN SANTZ-CRUZ of Chile, chairman of the subcommission on the prevention of discrimination and protection of minorities, said they were in Atlanta as individual members of the group at the request of Morris Abram, not as official representatives of the U.N.

Abram, a former Atlanta attorney and U.S. expert on the subcommission, said he extended the invitation because he wanted the members to see the South and because he regarded Atlanta as a sort of showcase.

Mayor Ivan Allen Jr. promised to show the visitors both the good things and the problems of a city which has benefited by fine relations between the races.

• • •

RALPH MCGILL, publisher of the Atlanta Constitution, said he was glad they had come to Georgia. He pointed out that both the mayor and Police Chief Herbert Jenkins had spoken in favor of a public accommodations law. Sixteen major hotels and motels desegregated recently and the public schools began integration in the fall of 1961.

"There is a will to get things done," McGill said. "But we have a share of incidents, too. You may see some before you leave on Sunday."

SYRACUSE
Herald-Journal
D. 132,375
PAGE ONE CERTIFIED
JAN 25 1964

UN Unit Visiting Atlanta Gets A Glimpse of Racial Problems

ATLANTA (AP)—Negro pickets protesting segregation greeted members of a United Nations group dealing with racial discrimination during its first visit to the deep South.

The marchers carried signs reading "Atlanta Needs U.N. Help" and "Atlanta-Gateway to the Segregated South" and they sang "freedom songs" in the rain after the visitors arrived Friday night.

The picketing by the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee occurred at the airport and again outside the motel where the group was staying. No incidents were reported.

But the demonstration gave U.N. members from 10 countries—the Soviet Union included —a first-hand glimpse of racial problems at the beginning of their two-day tour.

Lester Dunbar, head of the Southern Regional Council, was among the civil rights leaders and city officials who extended a formal welcome.

"In no other country has a revolution gone on under the protection of a constitution," he said, referring to the Negro campaign for equal rights.

"You will see people demonstrating their faith that Atlanta can be a better place than it is," he said.

Hernan Santz-Cruz of Chile, chairman of the Subcommission on the Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, said they were in Atlanta

(Concluded on Page 3, Col. 1)

UN Group Sees Unrest In South

From Page One

as individual members of the group at the request of Morris Abram, not as official representatives of the United Nations.

Abram, a former Atlanta attorney and U.S. expert on the subcommission, said he extended the invitation because he wanted the members to see the South and because he regarded Atlanta as a sort of showcase.

It is the first such visit of the group, he said, and there are no plans to go to any other cities.

Mayor Ivan Allen Jr. promised to show the visitors both the good things and the problems of a city which has benefited by fine relations between the races.

Ralph McGill, publisher of the Atlanta Constitution, said he was glad they had come to Georgia. He pointed out that both the mayor and Police Chief Herbert Jenkins had spoken in favor of a public accommodations law. Sixteen major hotels and motels desegregated recently and the public schools began integration in the fall of 1961.

"There is a will to get things done," McGill said. "But we have a share of incidents. You may see some before you leave on Sunday."

Mississippi Klan Crumbles From Pressure, Bickering

KKK

AC 3/27/67

JACKSON, Miss. (AP)—The Ku Klux Klan's once vigorous empire in Mississippi appears to be crumbling from outside pressures and inside bickering, authoritative secret files showed Sunday.

Money is short, interest is declining and Klan leaders are frankly worried.

Information on the Klan obtained by The Associated Press from the secret files was confirmed in interviews with law enforcement officers and Klan members.

Mississippi Klansmen are split into three feuding organizations. In three years, total membership has declined from more than 5,000 to fewer than 1,000, only half of whom pay dues and attend meetings, the files show.

"I'm sorry to say the white folks just won't stick together," says E.L. McDaniel of Natchez, grand dragon of the United Klans of America Mississippi Realm until he hung up his robes a few months ago—for good, he claims.

Ceremonies of the United Klans are public. They generally follow this ritual: anti-Communist speeches shouted from the backs of flat-bed trucks, flaming ceremonial crosses and passage of collection plates.

More than 3,000 Mississippians belonged to the United Klans at its peak during the hectic days of civil rights marches and "freedom" activities in 1964. Now there are fewer than 500 members. Of these, only 250 pay dues.

The most secretive of the Mississippi Klans is the militant White Knights of the Ku Klux Klan. Their cross-burnings are strictly business—often planted on someone's lawn as a warning.

The White Knights was formed near Brookhaven early in 1964 and had 2,000 members in southern Mississippi. "As militants, we are disposed to the use of physical force against our enemies," read the groups' executive orders.

Blamed for much of the terrorism that has plagued Mississippi since 1964, the White Knights now have fewer than 500 members.

Sam Bowers Jr., a Laurel coin machine operator identified by the FBI as the White Knights' leader, is under federal indictment in the deaths of three civil rights workers near Philadelphia, Miss., in 1964 and of a Negro leader near Hattiesburg two years later.

A third Klan group, the Original Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, has been active in neighboring Louisiana for years but is new to Mississippi and it has only 35 members, most of them mavericks exasperated by squabbling among members of the United Klans.

All three Klans are rife with discord and suspicion.

"Everybody suspects everybody," a veteran Klansman said. "The FBI has infiltrated us to the point where you can't trust your best friend. He might be an informer."

Three reasons are cited for the Klan's downhill slide in Mississippi: hearings by the House Committee on Un-American Activities in Washington, the indictment of Klansmen in the deaths of civil rights workers and the climate of suspicion among the Klan's membership.

Increased police efficiency and less sympathy by the public also contributed to the Klan's declining enrollment.

Aaron Henry, state president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, agrees that Klan membership is dropping off, but he contends a hard core of militants still is active.

"I think the reactionary and emotional tendencies that caused a lot of whites to join the Klan a few years ago are gone," said Henry. "The white community in Mississippi is beginning to adjust to seeing Negroes in restaurants, restrooms and other facilities formerly designated for whites only. It no longer causes a stir and makes headlines when Negroes use these facilities. I think this probably has done a lot to cut Klan strength."

One investigator said that, "When law enforcement officers and business leaders put the word out that they're not going to tolerate violence or cloak-and-dagger operations, there is a drop in Klan membership.'

Because of the always present fear of FBI and police informers, Klan meetings have undergone a change.

"Now we don't discuss violence," a Klansman said. "We go through our ceremonies and discuss what is going on in the community." But, the secret files indicate, there hasn't been much change in the Klan's attitude toward "straightening somebody out."

The Klans occasionally hold daytime meetings. One United Klans session in central Mississippi featured a visit by Imperial Wizard Robert Shelton of Tuscaloosa, Ala.

KKK

Klan Launches Youth Corps

ae 1/27/61

By TOM SHERWOOD

Ku Klux Klan leaders announced Monday night the formation of a Klan Youth Corps to "fight the spread of Communism and support Aemricanism."

The corps' formation was made public at a Klan rally in West End's Howell Park by Calvin Craig, grand dragon of the Georgia chapter of the United Klans of America, Inc.

Craig told a crowd estimated at 700 by klansman that the corps' purpose "is to defend ourselves, you the white people, from attack by Negroes and Communist sympathizers."

The corps will be made up of boys from 12 to 17-years old, Craig said.

About 100 persons signed the application blanks during the rally, Klan officials said.

Craig said the youths would be taught "self-defense and true Americanism." He said "no long-haired boys will be in it—they can join the girls club."

Craig said the youth corps "will be ready" for any disturbance.

"It's time to quit being peace-loving citizens and become Americans," Craig said. He said that throughout history Americans have "shed blood and died" for causes they believe in.

"If we're not willing — we don't even deserve to be American citizens," he said.

Speaking for more than 40 minutes, Craig again denounced the Atlanta Community Relations Commission and blamed that agency for the Dixie Hills racial distrubance last week.

He charged that the commission and race riots are "part of a Communist movement to gain control of this nation." He predicted riots would continue in every major city in the nation.

Craig urged the on-lookers, most of them under 25 years of age, to begin a boycott of the businesses of "city politicians who have sold the white people out."

Craig, interrupted several times by applause and rebel yells, said he would "announce soon a parade down Gordon Street to show that white people don't won't West End taken over by the niggers."

"As long as Stokely Carmichael (one of the leaders of the militant Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee) stays in Negro sections to stir up trouble that's well and good," Craig declared. "But if he or his cohorts put one fooot in a white section there's going to be hell in this city."

"The Klan is going into every white community in Atlanta and if there's any nigger disturbance we'll handle it so fast we won't need the Atlanta police," Craig said.

The grand dragon told the crowd to "register and vote." He said next year "will be the most important year — the general election for president" and asked the people to vote for Alabama's former Gov. George Wallace.

HERKIMER, N. Y.
TELEGRAM
D. 7,400

PAGE ONE
CERTIFIED

JAN 25 1964

PICKETS GREET UN VISITORS

ATLANTA (AP)—Negro pickets protesting segregation greeted members of a United Nations group dealing with racial discrimination during its first vist to the deep South.

The marchers carried signs reading "Atlanta Needs U. N. Help," and "Atlanta-Gateway to the Segregated South" and they sang "freedom songs" in the rain after the visitors arrived Friday night.

The picketing by the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee occurred at the airport and again outside the motel where the group was staying. No incidents were reported.

But the demonstration gave U.N. members from 10 countries—the Soviet Union included—a first-hand glimpse of racial problems at the beginning of their two-day tour.

Lester Dunbar, head of the Southern Regional Council, was among the civil rights leaders and city officials who extended a formal welcome.

"In no other country has a revolution gone on under the protection of a constitution," he said, referring to the Negro campaign for equal rights.

The News American (EVENING)
BALTIMORE, MD.
DAILY — CIRC. N. AVAIL.

JAN 25 1964

UN Group Eyeing Bias In Dixie

ATLANTA, Jan. 25—(AP)—Negro pickets protesting segregation greeted members of a United Nations group dealing with racial descrimination during their first visit to the Deep South.

The marchers carried signs reading "Atlanta Needs UN Help," and "Atlanta—Gateway to the Segregated South" and they sang "freedom songs" in the rain after the visitors arrived last night.

The picketing by the students nonviolent coordinating committee occurred at the airport and again outside the motel where the group was staying. No incidents were reported.

BUT THE demonstration gave UN members from 10 countries—the Soviet Union included—a first-hand glimpse of racial problems at the very beginning of their two-day tour.

Lester Dunbar, head of the Southern Regional Council, was among the Civil Rights leaders and city officials who extended a formal welcome.

"In no other country has a revolution gone on under the protection of a constitution," he said, referring to the Negro campaign for equal rights.

"You will see people demonstrating their faith that Atlanta can be a better place than it is," he said.

HERNAN SANTZ-CRUZ of Chile, chairman of the subcommisison on the prevention of discrimination and protection of minorities, said they were in Atlanta as individual members of the group at the request of Morris Abram, not as official representatives of the UN.

Abram, a former Atlanta attorney and U. S. expert on the subcommision, said he extended the invitation because he wanted the members to see the South and because he regarded Atlanta as a sort of showcase.

Hold Of Me'

lference in Jackson, Negro can't win in a with the whites. inority."

Negro leaders con- llowers, everywhere lies? Who, for ex- a for Harlem, the community in New anyone ask me to be said a Negro war hat's like putting me line in Korea and rifle with blanks."

begets violence and the of a white counter- as been noted by many "If that happens," said Carter, editor of the , Miss., Delta-Demo- hell will break loose."

the demonstrations in Birmingham last spring, a white taxi driver said to me, "If they kill any white people, I won't ask any questions. I'll just start killin'."

How Late The Hour?

The hour seems late. Is it one minute to 12 now? If so, what raced the hands of the clock?

The historic year in the long and anguished struggle over civil rights, was 1954. The U.S. Supreme Court struck down, as unconstitutional, the doctrine of "separate-but-equal" in public schools.

Segregation had been a legal fact for 58 years, based on a decision of the Supreme Court in 1896. Now, the court-ordered the schools to be desegregated "with all deliberate speed."

(Continued on Page 1, Part 2)

Negroes are well aware that when school opens their children will be vulnerable to disciplinary action by school officials if they miss school as a result of their demonstrating, says Mr. Evers: "We simply can't afford to take the chance of our children getting expelled. We remember Birmingham."

In that city, 1,081 school children were suspended or expelled for participating in riots in May. Though a Federal court overturned the school board ruling on a technicality, sources close to the Birmingham school board indicate youthful demonstrators will meet the same reception if they try again.

An Economic Argument

Southern school boards advance an economic argument for taking a tough stand on truancy caused by demonstrations: "We intend to be very intolerant of truancy of this nature," promises Savannah School Board President Dr. Darnell Brawner. "With more than half our operating revenues coming from the state on the basis of average daily attendance, we just can't afford to look the other way."

All this, of course, doesn't mean that young Negroes will be taken out of the picture entirely when school opens. Negro leaders note that nights and weekends will still be available for demonstrations. Also, militant Negro college students trooping back to school will doubtless form the core of many demonstrations in towns near their schools. Nevertheless, the opening of school signals the death knell for massive marches in many communities.

Besides being influenced by school reopenings, Negro strategists are reacting to the lack of success they've had with demonstrations in such Southern cities as Jackson and Albany, Ga. Demonstrations having failed to gain the objective in these towns, Negroes are switching to more subtle methods which some refer to as "guerrilla warfare."

Consider Albany, a little Southwestern Georgia trade center. Big demonstrations there in 1961 and last year have failed completely to budge an adamant city government. Quick police action has consistently broken up Negro demonstration efforts and, as a result, there hasn't been a major demonstration all this year, Negro and white leaders report.

"We had to switch strategy after the demonstrations had no tangible effect," says M. S. Page, executive secretary of the Albany movement. "And frankly, many of our adult Negroes simply don't have the backbone for it; they've been frightened off. So now we're waging guerrilla warfare, hanging on with bulldog tenacity."

Mass Boycott

The Albany Negroes have turned to a mass boycott. Since it began early this year, Negroes drive out of town to buy in nearby Moultrie, in Columbus, 85 miles away and even in Atlanta 170 miles away. Some go in a car pool arranged by the movement. "I figure I've spent about $2,000 out of town this

Please Turn to Page 8, Column 2

A Shift in Strategy

Mass Demonstrations Begin to Lose Favor With Integration Forces

Especially in Dixie, Negroes Turn More to Boycotts and Drives to Register Voters

Activists Soon to Be in School

By WILLIAM E. BLUNDELL
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

With the nation's attention riveted on tomorrow's march on Washington, who would claim the technique of public demonstrations, employed more than 1,000 times this summer, is losing favor with militant Negro rights organizations?

Many Negro leaders would—and do—make this claim, especially Negro leaders in the South. They reveal a significant shift in the strategy of civil rights groups.

"This is the watchword now: Stay out of jail, keep your money in your pockets and register every voter you can get your hands on," says Charles Evers, who has taken over as Mississippi field secretary for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People following the murder of his brother, Medgar, this summer.

What Mr. Evers is calling for are more intensive boycotts and stepped up voter registration drives in place of street demonstrations which put hundreds of Negroes into jail.

"Negroes are just beginning to realize that big demonstrations of the civil disobedience variety are not a magic formula," says Paul Anthony, field director of the Southern Regional Council, a respected bi-racial human rights group. "Demonstrations have been and will continue to be useful where they can trigger community action. But in some communities, the trigger is pulled but the gun doesn't go off. White resistance just solidifies."

Mixed Results

There's no doubt the demonstrations have been a costly and wearing proposition to civil rights advocates in some southern cities. While the massive demonstration technique did bring dramatic results in such cities as Birmingham and Nashville, it has been an abject failure in other cities such as Jackson.

In Dallas, Clarence Laws, Southwest Regional Secretary for the NAACP, puts it this way: "We're at a point now where the demonstration gains are being consolidated and new techniques devised. We know a pitcher can't go on winning games with nothing but a fast ball," he says.

It's no accident that Negro strategy is being overhauled just as schools around the country prepare to open their doors. With the children back in their classrooms, Negro leaders realize they won't be able to muster the huge crowds they've been able to call into the streets

"Negroes are just beginning to realize that big demonstrations of the civil disobedience variety are not a magic formula," says Paul Anthony, field director of the Southern Regional Council, a respected bi-racial human rights group. "Demonstrations have been and will continue to be useful where they can trigger community action. But in some communities, the trigger is pulled but the gun doesn't go off. White resistance just solidifies."

Mixed Results

There's no doubt the demonstrations have been a costly and wearing proposition to civil rights advocates in some southern cities. While the massive demonstration technique did bring dramatic results in such cities as Birmingham and Nashville, it has been an abject failure in other cities such as Jackson.

In Dallas, Clarence Laws, Southwest Regional Secretary for the NAACP, puts it this way: "We're at a point now where the demonstration gains are being consolidated and new techniques devised. We know a pitcher can't go on winning games with nothing but a fast ball," he says.

It's no accident that Negro strategy is being overhauled just as schools around the country prepare to open their doors. With the children back in their classrooms, Negro leaders realize they won't be able to muster the huge crowds they've been able to call into the streets during the summer vacation. High school—and often grade school—youth has formed the bulk of the Negro civil rights battalions that have battered at segregation's walls the past few months. White officials in Savannah, Ga., site of big demonstrations in June and July, estimate that "75% to 80%" of the 2,000 demonstrators they've had to deal with were juveniles.

Negroes are well aware that when school opens their children will be vulnerable to disciplinary action by school officials if they miss school as a result of their demonstrating, says Mr. Evers: "We simply can't afford to take the chance of our children getting expelled. We remember Birmingham."

In that city, 1,081 school children were suspended or expelled for participating in riots in May. Though a Federal court overturned the school board ruling on a technicality, sources close to the Birmingham school board indicate youthful demonstrators will meet the same reception if they try again.

An Economic Argument

Southern school boards advance an economic argument for taking a tough stand on truancy caused by demonstrations: "We intend to be very intolerant of truancy of this nature," promises Savannah School Board President Dr. Darnell Brawner. "With more than half our operating revenues coming from the state on the basis of average daily attendance, we just can't afford to look the other way."

All this, of course, doesn't mean that young Negroes will be taken out of the picture entirely when school opens. Negro leaders note that nights and weekends will still be available for demonstrations. Also, militant Negro college students trooping back to school will doubtless form the core of many demonstrations in towns near their schools. Nevertheless, the opening of school signals the death knell for massive marches in many communities.

Besides being influenced by school reopenings, Negro strategists are reacting to the lack of success they've had with demonstrations in such Southern cities as Jackson and Albany, Ga. Demonstrations having failed to gain the objective in these towns, Negroes are switching to more subtle methods which some refer to as "guerrilla warfare."

Consider Albany, a little Southwestern Georgia trade center. Big demonstrations there in 1961 and last year have failed completely to budge an adamant city government. Quick police action has consistently broken up Negro demonstration efforts and, as a result, there hasn't been a major demonstration all this year, Negro and white leaders report.

"We had to switch strategy after the demonstrations had no tangible effect," says M. S. Page, executive secretary of the Albany movement. "And frankly, many of our adult Negroes simply don't have the backbone for it; they've been frightened off. So now we're waging guerrilla warfare, hanging on with bulldog tenacity."

Mass Boycott

The Albany Negroes have turned to a mass boycott. Since it began early this year, Negroes drive out of town to buy in nearby Moultrie, in Columbus, 85 miles away and even in Atlanta 170 miles away. Some go in a car pool arranged by the movement. "I figure I've spent about $2,000 out of town this

Please Turn to Page 8, Column 1

A Shift in Strategy: Demonstrations Begin to Lose Integrationists' Favor

Continued from First Page

year," says Mr. Page, who recently motored to Atlanta to buy an air conditioner for his home.

The boycott appears to be having an economic impact. Retail sales in Dougherty County where Albany is located, after rising briskly in 1962, have slumped this year since the boycott went into effect. In the three months ended June 30, sales were off $438,000 from the $34,262,766 rung up in the 1962 period. In contrast, Colquitt County which embraces Moultrie posted a gain of $1,057,499 to bring sales to $12,359,197 in the same period. Sales in the state, as a whole, were also up in the quarter.

Negro leaders elsewhere are turning to the boycott as a primary weapon. "We're finding that a lot of people don't begin to feel any pangs of conscience until the cash register stops ringing," says the NAACP's Mr. Laws.

In strife-torn Danville where demonstrations have flagged, leaders have turned to an extensive boycott. "It's obvious the boycott can be the most effective weapon of all," says Rev. Lendell Chase, head of the Danville Christian Progressive Association. His group has had a boycott in effect since May, and now Rev. Chase is extending it to the entire county. Furthermore, he's asking Negro tobacco farmers not to sell their product in Danville markets; instead, they're to truck it out of the county. Yesterday, Danville's public schools were desegregated. Seven Negro children attended classes along with whites.

Civil rights leaders in Plaquemine, La., are now turning to a mass boycott of downtown stores, following unsuccessful demonstrations which occurred last week. Plaquemine officials effectively throttled the demonstrations by jailing 200 demonstrators, among them James Farmer, National Director of the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE). Also, the town obtained Federal court injunction against further mass marches and rallies.

But now Negro leaders see the boycott as a weapon to tighten the economic screws on the community. They are laying plans for bus convoys to roll into Baton Rouge, a dozen or so miles away, where Negroes from Plaquemine will do their shopping, if the leadership prevails.

Pressing Economic Warfare

Negroes in other Southern towns are pressing economic war. In Sumter, S.C., Negroes are being transported to Charlotte to shop. A boycott is also in effect in Charleston. In these and other places, Negroes have been heartened by successful boycott and picketing in such spots as New Orleans, where an Easter boycott was followed by the hiring of Negro sales personnel in downtown stores; and in Dallas, where drug stores were forced to take on Negro clerks. Possible future pressure points, particularly aimed at upgrading of job opportunities: Houston, Shreveport, La., Hot Springs, Ark. In Jackson, too, Negroes plan to redouble boycott efforts that began earlier this year.

Elsewhere, Negroes are also driving hard on voter registration. In some cases, these drives are being accompanied by experiments in self improvement. In Spartanburg, S.C., CORE is sponsoring community workshops in which Negro adults are taught to read and write. They're also urged to form neighborhood improvement associations which would help insure that trash is put out promptly and houses painted. "We're trying to prepare them for a fuller citizenship," says Frank Robinson, [illegible] secretary, who believes such action [illegible]er the charge from some whites [illegible]esponsible citizens.

[illegible] over strategy have [illegible] Negro factions in [illegible]e NAACP refused [illegible]eld downtown in July by the Chatham County Crusade for Voters (CCC), a former NAACP voter-registration arm that separated from the parent group and was converted into a direct action organization. The NAACP, dismayed at what it considered questionable elements attracted by the CCC, says its youth leaders were already negotiating with businessmen over admission to restuarants, bowling alleys and other facilities when the demonstrations erupted.

A Shaky Alliance

Both sides overtly have patched their differences, and businessmen have agreed to a desegregation plan effective Oct. 1. But the Negro alliance is shaky and businessmen fear squabbles among rival Negro groups could touch off new troubles.

It appears Negroes will need all the solidarity they can muster to combat the growing skill shown by many of the so-called "white power structures" with which they'll have to deal. In some cities, such as Shreveport and Danville, adult civil rights leaders have been charged with contributing to the delinquency of minors after demonstrations by Negro youths; Jackson and Danville, among others, have obtained injunctions against demonstrating. Savannah officials have robbed the CCC of its leadership by holding leaders in jail for extended periods on peace warrants. In other places, bail is set at high levels and cash instead or property is required for bond.

The determination of some white authorities to crush demonstrations and other direct action movements is exemplified by the city of Jackson. The Mississippi capital in June alone spent an extra $150,000 on its law enforcement program to meet the Negro demonstration efforts. Much of it went to overtime pay for policemen but $50,000 went for additional jail facilities. "We don't regret a penny of it," says Mayor Allen C. Thompson.

While this summer's rash of public demonstrations (the Justice Department counts 1,122 since it began tallying them on May 20) will undoubtedly taper off, no one expects they'll stop completely. There's a feeling they've been more successful in the North than in the South, for instance, and any decline there would be less drastic than in Dixie. Some Negro leaders also claim that "spontaneous" demonstrations are apt to break out when newly-militant Negroes become aroused over some situation—such as Congressional refusal to pass a strong civil rights law.

LWD 3 file
JS - file
Diff - Miss (stat) ~~Southern~~

The Fifteenth Amendment Comes to Mississippi

BARBARA CARTER

"All who are qualified to vote, both black and white," Senator James O. Eastland informed the Senate last spring, "exercise the right of suffrage in my state, as I am sure they do in Louisiana and other Southern states." The senator may find it easy to remain uninformed about other Southern states, but it must take a remarkable effort to remain unaware of the pressures and intimidations that prevent all but six per cent of the eligible Negroes from registering to vote in Mississippi.

The senator's home, a ranch-style house graced with three picture windows that look out on a deserted, tumble-down dwelling opposite, is the largest house in Doddsville, a tiny crossroads settlement in Sunflower County marked only by a traffic light. Just five miles to the north is the small community of Ruleville, where a Negro voting drive was launched last summer. Negroes who know the state call Sunflower County the "worst county in Mississippi" and Ruleville the "tightest town" in it.

In mid-August, a group of five Negro women from Ruleville drove to the county seat of Indianola to register. Indianola is the birthplace of the White Citizens Council, the militant segregationist organization whose influence still sets the tone for the county as a whole. The women were permitted to take the registration tests—a series of new and stringent requirements made it doubtful that they could pass anyway—and for the next two weeks a stream of Negroes from Ruleville made the trip to Indianola. Learning that the registrar's office would be closed for the month of September, the Negroes found a bus to use on the last day in August, and some twenty of them rode down to Indianola singing gospel and freedom songs on the way. On arrival, the driver of the bus was arrested and fined for driving a yellow bus: the color was too much like a school bus. Such imaginative uses of the law are not uncommon when Negroes attempt to register in Mississippi.

From the beginning, the mayor of Ruleville, Charles M. Dorrough (who had already run unsuccessfully for the more lucrative position of county sheriff and wasn't sure whether he should try again), had been aware that the Negroes streaming into Indianola to register were acting as if all the barriers so carefully erected over the years had suddenly turned into swinging gates. His reactions were frantic and confused but nonetheless effective. He briefly arrested a couple of young Negro students who were helping with the campaign. He called meetings of the white citizens to discuss the "outside agitators" who were bringing trouble to his town. He shut down Negro businesses wherever he could find minor violations. One woman who had taken the test found the mayor on her front porch, tools in hand, turning off her water because she was three days late in paying her bill.

Negroes with city jobs who were connected with the registration movement were also handled directly by the mayor. He told a sanitation worker who was fired that he would have trouble finding any job in Ruleville. The white citizens were quick to co-operate with their mayor. Many Negro sharecroppers and tenant farmers lost their jobs, and some were evicted from their homes as well. Even relatives of would-be voters felt the weight of the town's displeasure. One woman whose mother had taken the test lost the job she had held at the county hospital for many years.

One of the Negro tenant farmers, a Baptist minister named Jeff Surney, came from Senator Eastland's home town. Although he was not given time to complete his registration test, Surney was evicted anyway. He has had trouble finding work and a permanent home for his family. ("We have been moving ever since," he told me recently.) Surney, however, went to Washington and filed an affidavit with the Civil Rights Commission detailing the reprisals he had suffered. Within a month of his return, he was charged with passing a bad check at the gas station in Doddsville. The station's owner is very sorry about it all. He had often asked Surney to watch his children on evenings he and his wife went to dances. He admits that he was forced to bring charges, though he will not describe the pressure brought on him. "Jeff must have been misled and taken sides with the Communists," he has added as if in further explanation.

By this time, however, the Rule-ville campaign was all over. It ended the night of September 10, when three Negro homes were fired into by unidentified night riders. One of them belonged to the husband of a would-be voter whom the mayor had warned: "We're going to freeze you out, Joe. We can't have anyone living with us and working against us." Another belonged to a woman whose granddaughter, Vivian Hilliet, eighteen, and her friend Marion Burke, twenty, had stopped on their way to Jackson State College to pay a visit. Both girls were wounded, one critically, and were taken to the county hospital. When the energetic mayor arrived at the hospital shortly thereafter, he found a Negro student, Charles Cobb, a slight young man from St. Louis, taking notes on the girls' condition. The mayor promptly arrested him and rushed back to the house where the girls had been shot to announce that he had captured the man responsible. Cobb was released the next morning without explanation.

Mayor Dorrough still claims that he knows who was responsible for shooting into the Negro homes, but adds, "I don't want to pinpoint anyone personally, you understand." According to the mayor, "No local people were involved at all."

The Justice Department Moves

As head of the Senate Judiciary Committee, the senior senator from Mississippi must know that his state is the prime target of the Justice Department in its efforts to secure voting rights for Negro citizens under the Civil Rights Acts of 1957 and 1960. Of thirty-two suits brought in the South since 1961, ten have been filed in Mississippi alone, more than in any other state. In addition, matters involving registration and intimidation are under "active investigation" in sixteen counties, with the senator's county heading the list; and voting records, which can provide evidence for further cases, have been requested or are being analyzed in at least eighteen counties.

The Justice Department's activities are not restricted to the courts. Every step of the way is preceded by talks and letters to avoid suit if possible. Washington officials make no secret of their presence when they arrive in Mississippi towns to photograph registration books and poll-tax receipts—that is, when they can get a court order requiring the registrars to co-operate. Rarely is the co-operation voluntary. Though the department is woefully shorthanded in the face of the magnitude of its task, the six to seven lawyers assigned full time to the state have piled up an impressive number of hours in the field, and numerous Mississippi Negroes have been visited by Washington attorneys and the local FBI, coming as friends. According to John Doar, who is first assistant in the Civil Rights Division, "These people see you and get to know you. They begin to have some confidence that you mean what you say."

Most of the department's cases seek to prove that a "pattern or practice" of discrimination exists, and are brought against various registrars or sheriffs. But "the really great case," according to Doar, is the one against the state of Mississippi, its governor, attorney general, and secretary of state as board of election commissioners, and the registrars of six counties. In this suit the department is challenging as unconstitutional all the recent legal devices designed to deprive the Negro of his vote.

The first of these came in 1954, when the Mississippi electorate (which is ninety-five per cent white) voted to amend the state constitution to require that all future voters be able to interpret any of its sections to the registrar's personal satisfaction. No standards for judgment are given, nor does a later amendment, that the applicant be of "good moral character," require anything beyond the registrar's own opinion. Moreover, the legislature recently permitted the registrar merely to write "Failed" on the tests without specifying the reason (unless it had to do with "character"), the logic being that to do otherwise "may constitute assistance to the applicant on another application." The most severe requirement, added last spring by the resourceful legislature, ruled that the names of all future applicants must be published for a two-week period in the local press. This permits economic pressure, or worse, to be brought easily, immediately, and directly.

The Federal government points out that these stringent requirements apply only to those not yet registered, and the department can prove by photostatic copies of voting records now in Washington how one-sided the application of these laws can be. Not only are Negroes asked to interpret the more difficult sections of the state constitution, but whites are forgiven the most inadequate answers to the far easier sections given them. Though no help is permitted on the tests and minor errors can rule out Negroes, the forms filled out by whites show helpful little check marks penciled in on an easily overlooked line where a second signature is required.

Under the Civil Rights Acts the Justice Department can initiate voting cases directly before the district courts. Mississippi is divided into two districts, the Northern and Southern, and the department prefers to spread its cases evenly between the two to avoid overloading.

The Judges

Presiding in the Southern District is Judge W. Harold Cox, a friend of Senator Eastland's, who has the distinction of being President Kennedy's first judicial appointee. He was selected for the bench in June, 1961, to ensure the senator's co-operation, as head of the Judiciary Committee, on other appointments and to facilitate the necessary working relationship of the Justice Department with his committee. Some say it was a trade for Thurgood Marshall's confirmation as Federal judge. At any rate, Cox's appointment illustrates how an earnest drive in the field of justice can be thwarted by seemingly adroit moves in the field of politics. Judge Cox has acted on the bench like the staunch Mississippian he is. He seems to regard the entire effort of the Justice Department as a grave error in judgment, and evidently feels that his understanding of the Negroes and their situation in the South is somewhat beyond the comprehension of Washington officials. Here, for example, is his reaction when presented with the fact that Negroes are required to see the registrar personally while whites need go no further than the lower clerks: "I think the colored people brought that on themselves. I am thoroughly familiar with some of the conduct of some of the colored gentry and I am not surprised . . . You people up north don't understand what [the registrar] was talking about. I don't expect you to."

In the Northern District, the department faces Judge Claude F. Clayton, who has proved to be reluctant even to issue court orders requiring registrars to produce their records when they refuse the department's initial request. (The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals has recently ruled that such orders should be granted as "a matter of course.") Judge Clayton held up one such request for twenty-one months. Part of the delay was caused by his asking for lengthy arguments on the otherwise simple matter of substituting the present Attorney General's name for the former Attorney General's. The case had been filed a few days before the Kennedy administration took office, and usually in such matters the substitution of the new Attorney General's name is automatic.

Under Judge Cox, voting records have been slightly easier to get, and even a temporary restraining order has been won on one occasion. When he chooses, Judge Cox can act surprisingly fast. For instance, the contract of a Negro schoolteacher who had appeared as a government witness in a voting suit last spring was not renewed. When talks with the school board proved futile, the department did not hesitate to file suit. The case was heard within two months and Judge Cox handed down his decision in three days. Although his ruling went against the department, the case was at least released, and it is now on appeal.

